15,118. (By Dr. Farquharson.) You express a rather confident opinion, do you not, on the probability of cure in the case of young people?—In early life, yes; cases up to 40 years of age. I know cases both of dipsomania and morphiomania, that I could point to in which absolute recovery has been secured; but I should not be so sanguine about such people if they were put into a recognised retreat and branded ever afterwards as dipsomaniacs. These cases that I speak of in which complete recovery has taken place have always been under private care—never sent to an institution and branded as dipsomaniacs.

15,119. But would there not be a difficulty in treating the pauper class like that?—Of course, that is different. You cannot afford the kind of treatment I indicate in pauper cases.

15,120. Then, in order to make the best of a bad job, it would be desirable to have public institutions, where those people could be sent and compulsorily detained?—Yes. But the difficulty would be to prevent the relatives from taking advantage of these places too soon in cases of simple drunkenness. There is a great deal to be done in the home, and by private personal endeavour; and, if you allowed them to resort in the case of intemperate relatives to a public institution, you would deprive the relative of an incentive to the use of those domestic reformatory influences which are sometimes effectual.

15,121. But in every large town you find a certain residuum of drunken criminals largely responsible for the crime. Would you be in favour of seizing these people and shutting them up?—Seizing them on what grounds?

15,122. Oh, repeated convictions. Say, so many convictions in a year, and so many in the course of a certain period?—Yes. Of course, there would be great advantage in that to the good order of the towns, and the well-being of the sufferer himself, as you would prevent him from propagating his vicious variety, and perhaps give him a chance of recovery. But, of course, there is the great question of the liberty of the subject. How long is the confinement to continue; and under what conditions is it to be carried out? I should think two medical certificates should be required, and an order of a magistrate, and not less caution should be observed than in the case of a lunatic.

15,123. Would you be inclined to make the medical evidence the same as in lunatic cases?—I should certainly not make the precautions less; because, if a family wanted to get rid of an obnoxious member, they might select this means of doing so.

15,124. Do you think medical men would be satisfied themselves at having that work put on to them?—Medical men will do any work if it is of a professional nature, if they are paid for it, and if they are properly protected.

15,125. Have you come to any conclusion as to the period of time necessary to cure the habitual drunkard?—Are you speaking of that residuum class?

15,126. No; of the habitual drunkard generally?—It would depend on the condition of the patient, nature of the disease, and duration of the habit. I should think two years would be required in bad cases to establish a habit of self-restraint.

15,127. Do you draw a distinction between the influence of alcohol on the young and on the old?—Alcohol acts far more injuriously upon persons past middle life than upon the young.

15,128. Is it also particularly because the old drunkard has had his tissues structurally damaged by the action of the alcohol?—That may be so, when he has been a drunkard for a long time. But I mean that the injurious effects of alcohol are particularly obvious among those who take to drinking after middle-life. Then as regards young people, I have known cases of boys coming from school who have become addicted to drink; and, in these cases, I have seen complete recovery, even if they have gone very far.

15,129. You would require to give a large amount of latitude to the medical men in charge of the institution as to the period of detention?—To the medical men and the Board. I would not give indeterminate sentences of imprisonment, nor leave the detention altogether at the discretion of the medical officer of the institution. The duration of treatment would have to be decided by the Board.

15,130. Then, what would be the function of the Commissioner who visited those places? He could not tell, from the mere inspection of the patient, whether he was cured or nearly cured, or ought to go out or in, could he?—The Commissioner could see to the sanitary condition of the institution, and to the management and treatment given. He would give a private interview to each patient, and hear what he had to say; and then he would have access to the records of the establishment and hear the reports of the officers.

15,131. You would give him judicial functions?—I would give the Commissioners power to discharge, as they have in an asylum. The process in an asylum ordinarily is for a discharge to take place on the recommendation of the medical officer to the magistrates; but when the Commissioners visit an asylum, they have power to discharge should they think it expedient to do so.

15,132. Would you give power to prolong the detention, if it appeared necessary?—On the report of the medical officer. But may I suggest this: In the case of an asylum, if the friends of a patient propose to remove him, and the medical officer of the asylum certifies that he does not approve of this, the patient is not set at liberty. But he should be able to give a report to the Commissioners, and they should be empowered to give an order that he should be confined in another retreat.

15,133. You think it would be a convenience to attach those new institutions, in the case of paupers, to the present asylums?—I do. I think it would be an advantage to have all the skill and special knowledge of the staff of the asylum brought to bear on the sufferers from alcoholic degeneration. Nervous diseases are so closely connected with drunkenness that it would be well to have the advantage of the skill of the medical staff. It would be possible to have the institution near at hand, and thereby save expense.

15,134. Do you think the medical officers of the asylum would take objection to it?—I can quite see that they might.

15,135. Of course, you would have to have vigilant care exercised as to the introduction of liquor, and have a careful inspection of letters and parcels?—I foresee that difficulty; and also that asylums are generally near large towns. But, then, isolated positions, where there is no population, are not to be found in this country, except in a very few spots.

15,136. Are you still of opinion that the adulteration of beer has a special effect upon the nervous system?—I believe that adulteration does exist, and I believe there are great differences in the quality of wines. If I take a pint of claret supplied to me by my wine merchant, I feel no ill effects whatever; but, if I go to a hotel, perhaps, and order a pint of the same claret, I feel flushed, thirsty, and uncomfortable. There are different ways of treating and manufacturing wines that make them very different in their effects.

15,137. What are the direct effects of alcohol?—We have a whole sequence of morbid effects due to alcohol. Epilepsy is only a collateral effect. The direct effects are—intoxication, then delirium tremens, then the more protracted form of that which we call mania à potu, in which case a man may be insane for a few weeks, then, after that, either recovery takes place, or he passes into the monomania of suspicion, which I take to be one of the most dangerous results of chronic alcoholism. This is one of the forms of the disease from which homicidal maniacs often suffer—a form in which the delusions of delirium tremens exist in a chronic form; and it is really a stereotype of these delusions that you find in delirium tremens which are found in this monomania of suspicion, which often leads to homicidal acts, and which it is so difficult to get juries to recognise. And, then, we get chronic alcoholism, with dementia, in which a man becomes demented and stupid, and with symptoms akin to those of general paralysis.

15,138. Do you believe in the association between drink and crime on the large scale attributed to it? Do you believe the connection is always cause and effect, or is it coincidence?—Pure alcoholism may lead to crime, but crime and alcoholism may be both manifestations of disease of the nervous system. A man may be alcoholic, because he is a criminal. Crime from drunkenness may be a mere accident. A man gets drunk and quarrels with a companion, and seizes a book and strikes him and nothing is heard of it. But if it is a knife he strikes him with it turns out homicide, and the drunkard becomes a criminal. I believe a great number of criminals are weak-minded, and labouring under impairment of intellect.

15,139. Do you consider the effect of new spirit is much worse than that of old?—Yes, I do. Fusel oil is present in larger quantity in new spirit. Fusel alcohol is much more damaging than ethyl alcohol.

15,140. (By Col. M'Hardy.) I heard what you said about heredity and inebriety, and I want to read to you the evidence given by Mr. Quarrier, who is a well-known name in Scotland, and has passed some 10,000 children through his hands—a large number of them, as I understand, the children of drunken and diseased parents. He said—'I don't believe in any hereditary taint, except sin.' Then he was asked—'You don't think they turn out drunkards?' He said, 'No. I could cite scores of cases taken from the most drunken homes that are virtuous and well-doing to-day.' Then he was asked again about the children of criminals, he replies—'The same thing applies to their children, if you can get them young, say, six years old. Their manners and sight become sharp about five, and, if you can give me any young child from any home under five, I'll be bound for it that that child will have none of its father's immoralities and drunkenness. Both parents may be drunken, or drunken and everything that's bad, and that is my experience.' What do you say to that?—Well, I should say that Mr. Quarrier's experience is at variance with that of almost all experts in Europe and America. I do not under-rate the value of virtuous environment and early training, but they will not change the Ethiopian's skin or the leopard's spots. If the father's hand partakes too freely of fermented grapes, the children's teeth are certainly set on edge. Dr. How's statistics on idiocy clearly prove that idiots are in a larger proportion—and a much larger proportion—the children of criminal and drunken than of healthy parents. Then I would like to know the full extent of Mr. Quarrier's experience. If he is dealing merely with children he would not see the effects, because, as a rule, nervous diseases don't develop until after puberty. Was he dealing with children simply?—(Col. M'Hardy.) Yes; and he emigrates these children to Canada, and follows them and keeps in touch with them. There are so many of them there that there were 50 marriages last year of his people, and therefore he has continuous touch; and that is his experience of, as I say, 10,000 cases.—(Sir James Crichton-Browne.) Well, of course, there is a great deal of truth underlying what he says as to the importance of withdrawing children from evil and contaminating influences in early life; and there is no doubt that children of drunkards might be saved in that way. But it has never been alleged that all the children of drunkards suffer the consequences I have described—nervous or vicious propensities. We say, for example, given a hundred children whose parents have been drunkards, in these you might have 30 per cent. with disease; while given a hundred children of sober parents, in these you might have 5 per cent. diseased.

15,141-42. (By Dr. Sutherland.) Nervous disease may take the place of inebriate habits?—Yes; the legacy has many forms and that is one of them.

15,143. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) My impression has been that we have had cases of drunkards in Scotland almost week after week getting three or four days' imprisonment, and then out and in again; and apparently there's no deterrent in their going to prison, and there's no reformation. Don't you think, in cases like that, it would be desirable to give a bench of magistrates power to send these unfortunate martyrs to drink to a reformatory for a period of six months or longer without medical inquiry?—You mean, where you have had repeated convictions. Of course, in these cases, there would be no risk in such a procedure. I should say they are a small proportion of the cases where the man is a habitual drunkard, but never convicted. You see, if you have drunkards coming up again and again, a few cases may make an immense number of convictions. The cases are not to be measured by the number of convictions.

15,144. (By the Chairman.) You laid great stress on your preliminary remarks upon treatment. You said, 'with proper treatment.' What do you mean by proper treatment?—That divides itself into two different lines. Moral treatment, under which I include certainly not leaving them to loaf about or play billiards, and waste their time, but giving them work to do, and plenty to occupy their mind. And then there is the medical treatment. Of course, upon that, I can hardly enter here, but I may say it must be individual. In every case we see symptoms of nervous disease, which lead us to certain lines of treatment. Nerve tonics which are so much used now—strychnia and others—can be used with the most powerful effect in many cases.

15,145. You know a number of vaunted secret remedies have been proposed, such as the Tyson Cure, the Gold Cure, the Metabolic Cure. You have naturally seen what has been said about them. Is it your opinion, or that of the profession generally, that there is anything in them?—They are worse than useless and sheer quackery; creating fallacious hopes, and leaving the patient to sink down to lower depths.

15,146. (By Dr. Sutherland.) In speaking of the annexes you propose to set up alongside of the asylums, are you aware that Dr. Magnan of Paris has made a proposition to have a separate inebriate asylum in Paris to hold 600 alcoholic patients?—I should say, in the case of large towns absolutely, separate institutions would be possible; but I think it would be a very heavy burden, on the counties of England, if you required them to set up separate asylums. But in large cities, like London, it would be entirely proper to have separate institutions, both for the study of disease and for the treatment of it.

15,147. In speaking of the cure of dipsomania, have you more hope of those cases which come on as a vice than of those which come on as the result of disease or injury?—Decidedly; but I should not despair in either case.

15,148. In Scotland, lunatics are disposed of by two methods: one by the sheriff's warrant of committal on the strength of two medical certificates, the lunatic not being present; and the other a public inquiry before the sheriff, conducted by the procurator-fiscal, where medical men and other witnesses are examined, and where the lunatic may himself demonstrate his sanity or insanity. Would you prefer the public or the private procedure in the case of poor and rich alike?—Oh, the private. Do you mean that this takes place in the sheriff court before a magistrate?—(Dr. Sutherland.) Yes, in the case of lunatics found in the street, dangerous or offensive.—(Sir James Crichton-Browne.) Oh! I should prefer a private inquiry.

15,149-50. Would you not make some provision to give the man or woman some power of protesting?—I should give the same power as in the case of Chancery lunatics. A petition is served upon the alleged lunatic, and he or she is given fourteen days to decide whether or not to demand a jury. If they don't demand a jury, the inquiry is held before the Master in Lunacy. If they do demand a jury, the Lords Justices appoint a visitor to see whether he or she is capable of demanding a jury, and on the Visitor's report a jury is granted or refused. I do not for a moment propose a jury in cases of inebriety, but I think some option might be given the alleged dipsomaniac as to the mode of inquiry.

*Mr. David

MR. DAVID M'LAREN, Ex-Magistrate of the City of Edinburgh, called in and examined by the Chairman.

15,151. Would you please explain your past experience of the questions which have been remitted to us?—My experience of this question, I may say, began, first of all, as a director of the City Mission of Edinburgh, where we had a missionary who visited the police cells. But that was only casual. I did not pay much attention to the subject of habitual offenders in connection with their work. In 1856, I was elected to the Town Council. The whole council was re-elected at that time, and I went in for two years, 1856 to 1858. The police were under the control of the council, and I visited the cells occasionally. Then, after I left the council, in 1859, they sent me to the County Prison Board, where I continued till 1864. I had correspondence with Sheriff Watson of Aberdeen at that time, who was virtually the founder of the Ragged Schools in Scotland, and, I rather think, had to do with the first Reformatory School Acts. After that, my official connection with the subject ceased; but, as a justice of the peace, I received from Mr. Henderson, chief constable of Edinburgh, year after year, his returns to the Police Commission. I took the liberty of addressing the Lord Advocate, Mr. Balfour, in 1882, or somewhere between 1882 and 1884, in connection with the General Police Bill, which was being brought into Parliament that year; and I submitted to him a memorandum, which was virtually a good deal the substance of the paper I hold in my hand—a Draft Report of the Education Committee of the Edinburgh County Prison Board. Since then my official connection with the subject has ceased.

15,152. You refer in your notes, do you not, to the subject having been under discussion so far back as 1847?—In 1847, the Inspector of Prisons' report actually uses these words—I was very much struck with them.—'More especially is this applicable to a large proportion of the female prisoners. To use the ' words of Mr. Smith, the Governor of the Edinburgh gaol, as quoted in the Prison Inspector's annual report of 1847, "they return again and again; " and at each successive committal, the hardening " process makes progressive advancement." ' That was in 1847, almost fifty years ago.

M'Laren.

15,153. Then, in 1864, there was a committee appointed by the Edinburgh County Prison Board? It was a standing committee—the education committee of which I was convener, I suppose almost the whole time I was on the board. We had the subject of repeated convictions before us in 1862; and I have here a letter of Sheriff Watson's on it, dated the 10th of January of that year. It must have been in connection with some communication from the Aberdeen Board to Edinburgh. We expressed a very strong opinion upon it. In the report of this committee, adopted by the Board, the conviction was expressed that the system tended to foster crime, and this both as to juveniles and adults.

15,154. What system?—The system of repeated convictions and repeated imprisonments.

15,155. Then you got a remit from the Perth County Prison Board, did you not?—Yes, we did. That was in 1864—the beginning of 1864.

15,156. And that was the cause of your writing this report?—Yes. In 1864, the Perth Prison Board sent a communication to, I think, the whole of the Boards in Scotland, or, at least, to a certain number. The Edinburgh Board, at their meeting on the 7th April 1864, remitted, for the consideration of the committee, a letter of the Right Hon. Lord Kinnaird, sending ' his lordship's motion at the quarterly meeting of the ' [Perth] Board held on the 18th January, ' which minute sets forth, ' That the Board, having taken into consideration the number of cases in which persons have ' been sent to prison after repeated convictions, ' especially in reference to police offences, recommend ' that some measure should be taken in connection with ' other Prison Boards to enable the police magistrates, ' or sheriffs, after a certain number of convictions, to ' send such persons to a poorhouse, or other asylum, ' where they may be properly cared for and detained.'

15,157. That was remitted to our committee; and, I may say, that although all official connection on my part has ceased since then, any attention I have been able to give to it has only confirmed the opinion which was given in the report I then drew up.

15,158. (The Chairman.) Then just give us briefly the gist of the report?—(Mr. M'Laren.) In 1862 we had reported that the system of frequent recommitments, involving, of course, repeated short imprisonments, tended to foster crime, both in juveniles and adults. The first thing we did on the remit in 1864, was to endorse our previous deliverance on that subject. We then examined into the extent of the alleged evils of these repeated imprisonments and their consequences, and then tried to suggest something of a remedial nature. I presume, this committee have already had the evidence of Mr. Henderson as to repeated convictions in Edinburgh. I may say that I have several of his reports here, and I cannot but think that some tables in them, and his remarks upon them, afford striking illustrations of the conclusions of our own report. In that report there are some tables to which I would invite the committee's special attention. Table I. shows the extent to which the evil, which we were told to inquire into, prevailed. There are three years given here, 1860–61, 1861–62, and 1862–63. The first column gives us the number of commitments in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth respectively. We took Perth, because it was the gaol represented by the Perthshire Board. The figures I may read, and the percentages of re-commitments. Edinburgh, in 1860–61, there were 4424 commitments; and in the same year, in the same prison, there were 1468 re-commitments, or 33 per cent. In Glasgow the percentage was 23, and in Perth it was 18. In 1861–62, Edinburgh had 5395 commitments, of which 1903 were re-commitments, or 35 per cent. In Glasgow, the percentage was 24, and in Perth 15. In 1862–63, there was a remarkable change in Glasgow. In Edinburgh the commitments were almost identical with those of the previous year—5384; re-commitments, 1781, a percentage of 33. But in Glasgow the percentage was 44, and in Perth, 21. In our report, we mentioned that we understood that the extraordinary rise in Glasgow was to be accounted for by some new local police legislation. I now come to table II., which is the one which has most impressed anyone with whom I have conversed on the subject.

15,159. This table II. shows the number of criminals committed to Edinburgh prison in the quarter ended 31st March 1864,—that immediately preceding our report—who had previously been in custody in the said prison more than 29 times. Each one of them had been, at least, 30 times in the Edinburgh prison, and here is an important note—'in this table, each prisoner is ' only counted once, however often he may have been ' committed in the period to which the table applies.' A man or woman may have been committed two or three times in January, two or three times in February, and two or three times in March, but he is only entered here once. Here are the figures:—The average length of sentence passed in the quarter was between 30 and 31 days. The number of criminals was 58. Not to include three females, who were sentenced to 6, 12, and 6 months respectively, would reduce the average length of sentence to 24 days. In the aggregate the operation of apprehending, trying, imprisoning, and discharging these 58 persons who were imprisoned in the Edinburgh gaol in the first three months of 1864, had been gone through more than 2969 times in Edinburgh; and, probably, with not a few of them, the same process may have been repeated in Glasgow or other places. We thought that showed both the futility and absurdity of the system. I recollect—I was in business at the time,—I could not help comparing the police officers to my travellers. They went out, and had a regular number of customers, and these men figured so frequently, just as a regular customer would do in my own ledger, year after year.

15,160. (The Chairman.) I hope your customers were more profitable, Mr. M'Laren.—(Mr. M'Laren.) Well, I hope so; but, of course, I don't mean to say that the police took credit as a traveller would. In the figures of table No. 5 of Mr. Henderson's reports, there is a strong confirmation of the conclusion to which we came, that this system, instead of benefiting the community, did much harm. This is specially brought out in his report for 1882. In this table, for that year which I have analysed for myself, I have taken the number of those prisoners who were oftener than six times in Edinburgh gaol in the year. I find there were 87 of them, and that the number of arrests of these was 842—pretty nearly ten times each. And I may say, in passing, it is remarkable how uniform that average keeps up in other years.

15,161. But here is his remark—'This table includes ' several prisoners who have been in custody hundreds ' of times, and who continue year after year to form a ' constant source of trouble and annoyance to the public. It is not too much to say that every one of this ' class is the means of doing great injury in the neighbourhood which they frequent, and the cause of ' numerous arrests of other prisoners, who were drawn ' into a criminal life by their company and example.'

15,162. (The Chairman.) Does Mr. Henderson repeat that remark in any of his other reports?—I rather think he does. In fact, I used to be amused at his regular repetition of it. The last few years I noticed he dropped it. I wrote to him, and he said he was like a voice crying in the wilderness, so he dropped it.

15,163. But, in your own experience, have you noticed these repeatedly convicted criminals increase crime?—I have a letter which bears on that question—a letter from Bailie Anderson, who has a very high repute as a judicious magistrate in Edinburgh. He says:—'There can be no question that by the removal ' of some of the old and, to the police, well-known ' offenders from the districts of the city where such ' offences are most committed, one fruitful cause of ' disorderly conduct in others would be removed. ' Thus, do I often find two placed at the bar charged ' equally with the same offence—disorderly conduct, —and one of three an old offender, and the second appearing for the first time. In most cases the old offender is the real cause of the offence. The knowledge, too, that a penalty of long detention would follow the frequent commission of the offence would deter from cases of this kind.

15,164. What is the date of that letter?—March 24th, 1883. I told you that I had communicated with the Lord Advocate in reference to the General Police Bill of 1883.

15,165. And you proposed, did you not, that there should be a long detention of habitual offenders?—That was proposed by the Committee.

15,166. And you wished to impress the same thing on the Lord Advocate?—Yes. There is one case I am very anxious to bring before you, because a single case very often illustrates a general principle better than anything else. In Mr. Henderson's report for 1892 there occurs the following passage:—'I fear that, until a different mode is adopted with reference to the treatment of habitual offenders, no great diminution in the number of apprehensions for "Offences" can be hoped for. The following instance will show the mode in which a prisoner who has been more than 100 times in custody during the last six years was dealt with during 1892, when she figured 27 times in the police court.' This poor creature was only 24 years of age. 'January 9th, prostitution, fined 5s. or one day; January 25th, incapable, 10s. or seven days; February 22nd, 10s. or seven days.' She appeared seven and twenty times, at a great many of which she was fined 5s. or one day. At last, on September 12th, she was brought in for breach of the peace, and she gets 15 days' hard labour. That would let her out on the 27th September; and two days afterwards, on the 29th, she is apprehended again for breach of the peace, and that time she gets 21 days' hard labour. She would get out from that on the 20th October; and next day, October 21st, she is again arrested for breach of the peace, and again gets 21 days' hard labour. Then, she would get out from that on the 11th November; and, on the 16th, she is again arrested and fined 10s. or five days. On November 26th, 10 days. Afterwards, she gets 5s. or one day; and at last the judge lost patience, and on December 5th, for breach of the peace, she got 40 days.

15,167. You said, 'The judge lost patience.' Might it not be a different judge?—Well, I am speaking of the bench generally. That shows how positive evil is done by these frequent imprisonments. Governor Smith says, 'they return again and again, and at each successive committal the hardening process makes "progressive advance." That would show it did no good, but harm.

15,168. Then, I have a note of Sheriff Watson. What I have now to speak about is not in this report at all. It has occurred to me since. Thinking that, if you were to suggest remedies, you should know something about causes, I thought I might bring this out. One of the causes of frequent short imprisonments, which are not adverted to in the County Board Report for Edinburgh, is the want of more definite legislation as to the punishment for offences. Sheriff Watson's letter from Aberdeen, dated 1892, speaks a great deal of that. He speaks of police offences being visited with imprisonment, and says that that is one great cause of the great number of repeated offences; but he does not say how otherwise he would visit them. Whether he would like them to go on without being punished, or whether they should be dealt with by a fine, which, in many cases, could not be enforced, he does not make a suggestion.

15,169. There is another testimony on this subject, and that is the view of the thirteen judges. You said just now it might be another judge in the case of the Police Court. I am now speaking entirely from my own opinion. I think it quite right for the judge to have discretion, but, when a maximum of punishment is indicated for any offence, one would suppose it would be indicated upon the persistent offender; but if, instead of that, such an offender is visited with the most minimal punishment, one day for instance, instead of 60, which they might give, it goes without saying there must be frequent repeated imprisonment and habitual offenders. In this connection, I may mention the practice of the late Bailie Thomas Maxwell, a most conscientious judge. When he went to the bench, on the first day he sat there, he said, 'I wish it to be known on what principle I intend to sit here. When I find those brought up to me for the first time I'll try to speak as gently, as firmly, and kindly to them as I can, and then dismiss them. When I find those brought up here who have been up often before I intend to give them the very longest punishment I can inflict.' He did so, and the result was, the first Sunday he went to the chapel in the gaol a woman, who had been visited by him with such a severe punishment, took up the readiest missile she could find and flung it at his head. That showed the way on which they looked upon it. Bailie Anderson says he has seen a man plead notguilty in the hope that the judgement day was one who would take a lenient view of his case.

15,170. As to punishment, I may, perhaps, be thought very heretical, but I venture to think we may have been on the wrong tack of late. I hold that punishment ought to be viewed, in the first place, as deterrent, and second, as reformatory, although, of course, it is very much the first in importance to the offenders themselves. But, as regards the community, I don't think we have sufficiently recognised the deterrent principle, and consequently we have lost sight of the community's interest. To reform the offender is well, but to prevent others becoming offenders is better. These are two distinct lines. I think we ought to keep both before us, and in the order I have stated.

15,170A. Reverting to the County Prison Board Committee's Report, under sections 6 and 7, we have our suggestions. First, as regards whipping. I don't profess myself to know whether I would attach much importance to it or not. For example, whether more male juveniles might be punished by whipping than are now done? It is understood there are commitments attached to this sentence which render magistrates chary of inflicting it.

15,171. You are aware, are you not, that in Edinburgh they have some strong prejudice against whipping which does not appear to be shared in other towns?—I was told they were afraid of some legal disabilities. I do not refer to whipping for heinous offences. There was a great disinclination in whipping for juveniles of late years, but there was a great disinclination in punishments of all kinds after the Reformatory Acts came into operation. We thought it might be for inquiry whether prison discipline was capable of change, making it more severe in some respects; whether it should not be more punitive. But the Prison Discipline Society might be a far better authority than any suggestions which a private individual could make. When a sentence is only for two months, or less, ought there to be any relaxation of severity before the close? That is merely a suggestion. Ought the inconvenience of imprisonment to be allowed to wear away before the prisoner gets out? I venture to suggest that for your consideration. I understand that sometimes there's a diminution as time goes on.

15,172. (By the Chairman.) Yes; but that hardly applies to our case. The average commitments of habitual offenders with whom we were told to deal in Scotland were only for 15½ days, so they have no time for a mitigation in the severity of their punishment. —(Mr. M'Laron.) Governor Smith said—'Give me power, and I'll empty the female side, at least, of the Edinburgh prison in a single month; give me power, to cut the hair of all prisoners, and that will be done.' He said, 'You can have no idea how they dread that. There was one poor girl who was in fever, and the surgeon told her she must have her head shaved, to save her life she would not allow it. At last I got her to do it by saying I had been submitted to the same operation myself.' Sir Alexander Gibson Maitland, who was a member of our Board, says, 'I have seen a soldier go down on his knees to me that he might not be sent to the black hole, because that involved cutting his hair close.' Showing how much they objected to it.

Mr. David
M'Laron.
30 Jan. 1895.

Mrs. David M'Laren. 15,173. What does your Committee say on the subject?—More especially would they suggest a measure which, in the opinion of those best fitted to judge, would not meet effectually in the way of deterring than any minor punishment that has been tried. It is certain that, in all cases of recommitment above a fixed number of times, the prisoner's hair should be closely cut. This is regularly and invariably done at the large penitentiaries of Millbank and Brixton, so there is still the sanction of prison usage if that be asked. But, even if these were not, it may be doubted, as has been already said, whether the ameliorations of prison discipline have not gone too far, and whether it may not be time to reverse our steps in some measure. It has been stated, on good authority, that there is no punishment so much dreaded; and it is believed the number of recommitments, both male and female, would be immediately diminished by the adoption of this practice.

15,174. Then, I may mention the suggestion of Sheriff-Substitute Hallard, long on the police bench of Edinburgh: 'Every police judge and sheriff should have it in his power to inflict six months' hard labour without a jury.' I question very much whether that could be enacted, and apparently the County Board Committee did not take it up. I don't know what the powers of English police judges are in that matter.

15,175. What about Bailie Anderson's suggestion?—His suggestion was that in such cases the sitting magistrate should have it in his power to remit them to a higher court—to the sheriff-substitute, for instance.

15,176. That is in the case of repeated conviction, is it?—Yes. Instead of sentencing, as that poor creature was sentenced, to one day's imprisonment, the judge would say, 'You have been here so often, I'll remit you to the Sheriff's Court.'

15,177. I come now to the reformatories?—We thought that a prolonged detention in the reformatories would not only lead to their reformation, but it would also act as a deterrent. Bailie Anderson bears testimony to that.

15,178. But what reformatories are you talking about? You are talking about proposed reformatories for adults, are you not?—Yes. We thought the principle of juvenile reformatories might be extended to adults, and, I believe, there was great success in Ireland in what were called Intermediate Prisons. The idea was that the age should be extended from 16 to 18, or even more.

15,179. But has not that been done?—That was for ordinary reformatives. We would have made new reformatories for adults, instead of giving them merely criminal imprisonment. The effect would be to place the offenders in the more favourable position brought out in the first half of our table III.

15,180. In that table there is a comparison of two quinquennial periods, ending respectively in 1856 and 1861, showing the average yearly number of the previous imprisonments in the same prison of prisoners received in these two periods. In the former, the yearly average of those committed once before, was 231.6, in the latter, 256.5, showing a decrease of 751 or 22 per cent.; in the former period of those committed twice before, the average was 165.6, in the latter, 125.3—a decrease of 25 per cent.; the decrease in the second period of those committed three before, was 13 per cent.; of those committed four times, 11 per cent.; of those committed five times, 5 per cent. But when you come up to those who have been in prison from 6 to 9 times, there is an increase of 7 per cent.; from 20 to 50, 5 per cent.; and above 50 times committed, 56 per cent.;

Miss AGATHA STACKY, called in and examined by the Chairman.

Miss Agatha Stacky. 15,186. Miss Stacky, I understand you have been a member of the King's Norton Board of Guardians, at Birmingham, for 12 years?—Yes.

15,187. And you are honorary secretary of Home for Feeble-minded Women, and vice-president of the Association for the Care and Protection of Young Girls?—Yes.

15,188. In connection with Birmingham, can you tell us anything about the Birmingham method of dealing with vagrants?—I am not in Birmingham showing that these frequently committed were getting harder and harder. Mr. David M'Laren.

15,181. But how do you account for this decrease in the number of the once, twice, and thrice committed?—It was thought that the marked decrease in the latter five years was due to the influence of the Reformatory Act being held of the young. I think the Reformatory Act came into operation towards the end of the first five years, and during the second time under consideration. Sheriff Watson suggested these tables, referring to the Irish Intermediate Prison Act for female refugees.

15,182. (By the Chairman.) But as for the percentage, I find, if you come down to later years, the percentage has gone up enormously; and that the percentage of once previously convicted in the quinquennial period ending 1893 was 145 per cent. There was an increase in the last year on 1861 of 217 per cent. of those imprisoned a second time; 269 per cent. of those imprisoned thrice, and so on. Doesn't that rather contradict your theory?—Not having seen the Returns which bring out the results you quote, I can express no opinion. The remaining table of the County Board Committee Report to which I would invite special attention is No. IV., bearing on the ages of prisoners when committed. This table shows that in the first quinquennium the yearly average of the total commitments in all the prisons of Scotland was 21,372, in the second, 18,575, showing a decrease in the latter of 13 per cent. But the analysis of the ages of the prisoners when committed brings out a striking result. The decrease of prisoners committed under 16 years of age was 35 per cent.; of those between 16 and 18, 34.7 per cent.; between 18 and 21, 21.2 per cent.; between 21 and 50, 6 per cent.; above 50, 1.6 per cent.; showing that the improving influence, to whatever it was due, had less and less effect, as the prisoners grew older. Hence the great importance of sending younger offenders, even above the age of children, to a Reformatory instead of committing them time after time to gaol. It was well known in Edinburgh that in the latter of these two periods, the prison there was nearly cleared of juvenile offenders, a result attributed to Dr. Guthrie's Ragged School, and the operation of the Reformatory Act.

15,183. The last thing I have to say is, if you were to establish a principle of 'habit and repute' in regard to offences, as you have done in regard to crimes, the immediate effect would be very much fewer convictions and much longer imprisonments; and, I believe, it would be cheaper for the community in the long run. The objection, of course, is this:—I have known a police judge who would not give a poor woman a severe sentence for stealing 5s. however often she had been convicted. The answer is:—The severe sentence is for a long course of crimes or offences, not for the last act of the course.

15,184. (By the Chairman.) You were good enough to send us a copy of a Bill introduced by Lord Kinnaird, and we purpose to print that in our Appendix. Did you approve of that Bill, or not, as a Committee?—That Bill was not introduced till long after our Committee. Lord Kinnaird got that minute of the Perthshire County Prison Board sent to us in 1864, but his Bill was of a later date.

15,185. But, individually, you do not approve of some of the provisions of the Bill?—Oh, I have not looked at the Bill, because I sent it to you. I don't remember it all. But I remember that the Edinburgh County Prison Board did not approve of the suggestions of the Perth County Board—that prisoners were to be sent to the workhouse. If they were to be longer confined, they should not be amongst honest people, or presumably honest people.

proper. King's Norton Union only takes in some of the suburbs of Birmingham; so of the Birmingham parish. I must not speak. I can only speak about our own Board.

15,189. Then you don't know about the Birmingham system of the workhouse?—I would rather not say anything about it. I don't know enough to speak upon it.

15,190. (By Miss Stevenson.) Your work has been in connection with the care and protection of girls who are weak-minded?—Yes.

15,191. How did you first come to take up this work? How were these cases first brought under your notice?—Do you mean, how was I first interested in the work?

15,192. Was there an association formed for the care of those girls, or was it in connection with your work as a poor law guardian that you saw the necessity of such care?—All my work as a poor law guardian made me feel the necessity for something to be done for these young women; and it was through that that our association was formed. It was because I saw so many cases that I thought might have been saved, if I had any homes for them, and that I could not save, that I thought I must do something for them.

15,193. So you formed a committee, or association, for carrying on this work?—For starting homes for feeble-minded women and girls.

15,194. Were those girls originally paupers, who had been brought up in district schools under the care of the poor law guardians?—Our association is willing to take those, and also private cases. It takes both kinds.

15,195. You receive cases sent by the poor law guardians, and you also receive other cases, reported about by benevolent persons interested in the cases?—Yes.

15,196. Perhaps you would be good enough to explain to the Committee the system under which you work, what your work is, and your method of dealing with these girls?—Our organisation has a central council in Birmingham, and a separate executive committee for each home that we might start. We have now two homes—one nine miles on one side of Birmingham, and the other nine miles on the other side. The council superintends the whole, and manages the business. The executive committees manage each home.

15,197. What official staff have you in each home?—That, you see, depends upon the number of girls; but we are just completing our second home, which has only been open a year and a half. We shall then, probably, have 17 in one home, and 18 in the other; and then we shall have about the same number of matrons in each. We shall consider that for 17 or 18 girls we shall require a lady superintendent, a workroom matron, a kitchen matron, and, probably, a young lady probationer—some one to assist the lady superintendent—as assistant matron. We have one who has not a salary at all. We take young ladies who want to train themselves, and they come for nine months or a year.

15,198. Then, is the necessity for having such a large staff due to the fact that those girls require a great deal of supervision?—It is because our rule and principle is, that we shall never for a moment, if possible, let those girls be alone; neither one alone, or two together alone, without a matron. Incessant companionship and supervision is our principle.

15,199. Are they such cases as might come under the provisions of the Lunacy Laws?—No, they are not. They are just those who can't possibly come under those; nor can they be kept in a workhouse. They are simply belonging to that class—and we find so many belonging to it—that unfortunate class of women who are just weak-minded, just a little deficient, not quite all there, not quite sharp.

15,200. Do you find that morally they are worse than other girls of the same class?—Well, our work began entirely by being preventive work, so that I am not quite able to answer the question; and everybody knew it was quite preventive, so cases of moral deficiency were not much brought before us. We have had applications for them, but not many. One of our homes is for those girls who have had a first fall; but we are very careful not to take any who are vicious or depraved in the least.

15,201. But they belong, do they not, to the girls who would be very likely to fall into the 'unfortunate' class, if there were no one to shield them?—That is just why I wanted to save them; because I know in a few years they would be bringing trouble on themselves and on the community.

15,202. How are you supported?—We want to be supported only by two sources—the payments made for the girls, and the money the girls earn. We don't want to have to get any other money at all. We want that to be sufficient.

15,203. You receive nothing from the poor rates?—No; but the poor law guardians pay for every girl they send us.

15,204. And that is included in the payments made for the girls?—Yes.

15,205. Would you object to having any Government aid, such as the reformatories receive?—Yes, I think we should. We should feel, if there was any Government aid over and above payment made for each particular case, that these homes were a failure. That is my private opinion.

15,206. Will you also tell the Committee how much it costs for each girl?—We have just had nine months of our third year; and, according to the accounts, I gather that our home of 17 girls will cost this year just £400.

15,207. Is everything included in that?—Everything, except new furniture and the general secretary's stamps and printing; but the lady superintendent's stamps and printing, and travelling, &c. are all included in that £400. That is for 17 girls.

15,208. And would you tell us how much the girls contribute to their own support; is it an appreciable sum?—Yes. I hope this year we shall only be about £20 short. I had hoped to be able to say we could make ends meet, but we have had our matrons ill, and have had doctors' bills to pay.

15,209. Can you tell us what industries you have for the employment of the girls?—Well, of course, there's the inevitable laundry-work. We couldn't do without it. But it is not all girls who can go into the wash-house, especially feeble-minded ones, or stand over the ironing-tables. It is only our sharp ones who can iron; so we have tried to invent other things for them to do. We make about 6000 knitted floorcloths in the year, which are sold to institutions, and about 400 church kneelers and hassocks. Then we make about 10 of these in a week, prices, 5s. 6d., 6s., 11s. (producing doormats and bedroom hearthrugs). We make them all sizes and in all colours, and different kinds of wool.

15,210. I understand there are some parts of the work, even of this kind of mats, that you require skilled labour for; that it is only part of the work that can be done by the girls, and part of the expense is that you must have a skilled person to do the finishing off?—That is so; but, of course, that comes out of the expenses. That makes our profits a little less.

15,211. How long will a girl take before she can do this kind of work?—It varies so much. Some of our girls will never be able to do it. I think only half are able to do it; but one of our most feeble-minded ones is being taught to pick out the colours, as she has an eye for colour. We try to find out what each girl can do.

15,212. Do you find that the friends of those girls are willing to send them to you, and pay for them?—I must say, that out of the 400 applications I have had, a great many have been refused, because there would be no payment with them. But, seeing we have had applications nearly every day, we can afford to choose what girls we will have, and only take those who will do us the most credit, and do the cause the most good.

15,213. Then, do you think that ultimately those girls will be sufficiently improved to go out in the world and work for themselves, or go back to their friends and live at home?—I think it is just possible that some of the very sharpest may be in the course of two or three years, but not the majority. Our idea is that they will be permanent homes as long as people will pay for the girls.

15,214. Then they are cases that would really, but for your intervention, become chargeable to the poor law guardians?—Not only so; but probably a still heavier charge would come upon the poor law guardians.

15,215. They might drift into the criminal classes, you mean?—Yes, no doubt; and their descendants would be chargeable to the rates on account of imbecility. I think I could not trust our girls, if they were left to themselves. They are not strong-minded enough to keep themselves out of evil.

Miss Agatha Stacey.

Miss Agatha Stacey.

30 Jan. 1895.

15,216. Do you find they have any tendency to intemperance?—No; I don't think I do at all. I thought I would try to find out in the case of the 40 girls who have passed through our homes how much the drink had had to do with it. We have had 40 altogether in our homes. 12 have left us. But I find out of the 40, there are only 15 whose parents were unsteady, and 17 had parents who were very respectable.

15,217. Can you tell us what became of the 12 who left?—I have a list here of what became of the 12. We sent 4 away, because we saw signs of depravity; we sent 3 away, because we saw signs of insanity (one of those had been with us a year and a half when it developed); 2 were generally unsuitable; 1 subject to fits; another imbecile; and, in the last, payment was stopped. That was a private case.

15,218. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) What payments do the poor law authorities make for the girls?—We charge the same for poor law and for private cases—£13 a year. But if a girl is too feeble-minded to earn her share of the expense—if she can't earn more than a shilling a week—we charge 6s. a week instead of 5s.

15,219. (By Col. M'Hardy.) Did you say that very few of these girls you really expect will ever recover?—Very few of them; very few have enough brain power.

15,220. When you started these homes you intended that they would be permanent institutions?—Yes.

15,221. They are all there, of course, with the consent of their people, because they pay?—Yes.

15,222. But have you any idea of how many persons there are afflicted in this way in the country?—I have no idea; but I have been told by medical men that this class is increasing at a higher ratio than the actual lunatics. It is increasing because of our wretched poor law system. I, as a poor law guardian, have known two generations and three generations of illegitimate feeble-minded women and girls.

15,223. Must feeble-mindedness be very marked before you take in a girl?—It must be so marked that no other training home would keep them, and no mistress would keep them in their situation.

15,224. (By the Chairman.) What market have you for these mats?—Nothing but our own endeavours. We have not yet put them into any shop, because we have not needed to. We showed them at the Church Congress at Exeter, and through that we have had a good sale.

15,225. Can you sell as many as you can make?—We have since September. We have been quite full of orders since September.

15,226. And this does not come into collision with any one else?—Well I have not seen anything exactly like them.

15,227. You made use of a rather strong expression just now in regard to the poor law system. 'Our wretched poor law system,' I think, you said?—Yes. I'm afraid I'm rather hasty in my words sometimes. I ought to be more reticent, being a guardian myself.

15,228. In what respect do you mean the word 'wretched'?—Well, of course, it's a social question that we all know must be faced. The poor law allows any one to take their discharge as often as they like; and so these poor feeble-minded women go in and out of the workhouse, and become degraded, and have illegitimate children, who, in their turn, have illegitimate children. If the poor law could say to a woman, who had come in more than once with illegitimate children, 'now you are not fit to have your liberty in the world;' but it can't.

15,229. I suppose the associations of the poorhouse have not at all an elevating effect upon such characters?—No.

15,230. In connection with your poorhouse, have you a casual ward in your parish?—Oh, yes. I suppose all workhouses have casual wards.

15,231. Then, you have female casu-als, I suppose?—Oh yes.

15,232. And you, as a leading member of the Board, Miss Agatha Stacey. would naturally look after that? I have occasionally gone in to see them.

15,233. What sort of people are they? Do you think there are many decent women among the casu-als?—No; hardly such a thing as a decent woman.

15,234. There must be, I presume, a class of poor women who are unable to pay railway fares, and obliged to walk when they want to migrate in search of work. What becomes of them?—I don't think there are a great many decent women who migrate. There are a few in the summer; hop-pickers and harvesters, who, I would say, were tolerably decent; but, except at those seasons, I don't think there are many in England. I think a decent woman, if she wanted to go to another town, would beg money from friends, or save up, or pawn her best jacket, rather than tramp to another town and go into a casual ward.

15,235. But, if she doesn't happen to have friends or a best jacket? We visited a woman, for instance, who had earned a few pence, and had given the pence in getting her two children food. She had been turned out of her lodgings, and she went along the street crying. Someone suggested that she should go to the police office. We found her locked up in a cell with her children, and provided with a piece of bread, and quite happy—apparently more comfortable than she was wont to be. There was no reason to imagine that there was anything wrong with this woman. She had every appearance of respectability. Her story was, she had been recently deserted by her husband, and, in fact, she was dead beat. There must be women of this sort everywhere, don't you think?—I think there must be a few; but I think its no hardship for those few to find shelter and bread in our casual wards. They would not be hardly treated. I think there must be only a few.

15,236. Are they kept separate from each other?—No; not the women with us. The men have separate cells, not the women.

15,237. The women are all congregated together?—Yes, I think so; but we have so few women in our vagrant wards.

15,238. What task do they have?—The women have no task at all. It is the men who have a task.

15,239. We were told by a witness to-day that the theory was, that every casual must pay for his or her lodging by the performance of some task?—Well, I don't think our women do.

15,240. (By Dr. Sutherland.) You might tell us your views regarding the relief of able-bodied men at your workhouse. How do you employ them; and is it necessary for them to enter the workhouse when in temporary distress?—Yes; it is generally necessary for able-bodied men to take an order for the house, and enter the workhouse.

15,241. In that case, he is registered as a pauper?—Yes.

15,242. Have you any other means of employing them without going to the workhouse?—In cases of immediate emergency and distress, the guardians do get special work for them, and pay them so much a day—half in kind and half in money—instead of their going into the workhouse.

15,243. Is that out of consideration for the feelings of the British working man, or is it due to the exigencies of the casual ward that make it necessary?—It is the special distress that makes it necessary. It is only the dissolute, and the casual, and the loafer, who need go into our casual ward at ordinary times.

15,244. But, supposing an honest man in distress came to your Board asking relief, can you say to that man, Well, we will give you work, and you can go to your own home and live, and we will pay so much for your work?—Yes; it is done sometimes. It is done just now, because we have the means of doing it.

15,245. Do you approve of it?—Yes, I do. I wish it could be extended more. I wish Local Boards and Boards of Guardians could be united to give these men public work in this way.

15,246. In other words, in Birmingham, which is abreast of most towns in municipal and parochial matters, you employ them and relieve them without compelling them to register as paupers, or enter the workhouse?—That is our great desire, if we can do it. We are building a new infirmary, and the field has to be dug up, and we are employing men on that field to take away the turf. We have been telling our relieving officers to send able-bodied men here, and they can go back to their own homes at night. We have made the rate of payment more lenient than ever before, because there is much distress now in Birmingham.

Miss Agatha Stacey.

30 Jan. 1895.

15,247. What accommodation have you got in your workhouse at King's Norton?—For 400 adults and 160 children.

15,248. Is there enough accommodation?—We mean it to be one of the best in England when we have got our new infirmary.

15,249. How much accommodation have you in your casual ward?—I can't tell you. I should think for about 40. Our vagrants have been increasing in the past year.

15,250. If you dispense with your casual ward as such, would not that afford you accommodation?—How could we dispense with it?

15,251. By the means you have mentioned.—(Witness.) Oh, but men are often travelling from one place to another.

15,252. You distinguish between the travelling and the resident?—Our workhouse master can spot at once whether a man is a traveller or a regular vagrant.

15,253. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) You don't let able-bodied people into the workhouse without putting some test?—No; we have no test.

15,254. But you put some on the treadmill, don't you?—No.

15,255. Oh! that is the case in some poorhouses, is it not?—Yes; some may have it. We have no test. Our only test is destitution.

15,256. But some poorhouses would make a man, as a proof of the sincerity of his poverty, go through a course of the treadmill?—I do not know that they do. Our treadmill, just now, is taking up the stuff in the field; and since we have had a labour-master, and put able-bodied men on it, dozens of the able-bodied men have left, because they would not work.

15,257. (By the Chairman.) You are certain about the treadmill?—Yes; but I think that Birmingham has its test house.

15,258. That is true; but any treadmill?—I am not quite sure.

15,259. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Do you know how many of the girls in your home are illegitimate?—Yes; much fewer than I expected to find. But then, the reason is, that it is only of these 40 that I can speak. If I could possibly have given you information about all the 400 who have applied to me, it would be much more interesting; but I'm afraid I can't, because, unless they are able to come to us, we don't ask this question. To those who are likely, I send round a paper with questions to be answered, and a medical certificate to be signed. There are only four illegitimate girls. The question, 'are you illegitimate?' is not on the paper; but it is answered by the question whether the parents are respectable. But, out of the forty, there are as many as six whose parentage is perfectly unknown; so that all the six may be illegitimate for what we know. That would be ten out of the forty.

15,260. Do the girls improve intellectually in your hands?—Up to a certain point, very much.

15,261. But you have not had them long?—Only two years and nine months at the longest.

15,262. Don't you expect that, in the course of ten years, there may be intellectual and moral improvement?—I do. There is a very great moral improvement already, and some are intellectually improved already.

15,263. So it is not hopeless to expect that they may get out into life?—No, certainly not; but a girl who can't be taught to use a needle, or to knit, or to do anything but hold a pair of scissors and cut up pieces of stuff in two years, what can you say to that? But she can turn the mangle, and scrub the floor.

15,264. Of these 400, whose names were sent to you, were the greater number the sort of girls you would have received if you had had room for them?—As far as I could judge from the first letter, yes. From most of them I have only received one letter.

15,265. Does your society contemplate building more homes?—Yes, if we have the money; and we would like to encourage other towns to take the matter up.

15,266. Have other towns taken it up?—We were not the first. Painswick was the first; we were second; and the third was Hitchin; fourth, Bristol; and fifth, Liverpool.

15,267. Have they similar institutions?—Very much. I am afraid none of them are so permanent as ours, because I had a letter only the other day from the Liverpool Home, begging us to take a girl from them with whom they had no fault to find, except that she stared vacantly, and showed no signs of improvement. From that, I judge the institution is not for permanent cases.

15,268. (By Miss Stevenson.) I suppose you consider that the number of superintendents you have amongst those girls obviates the objection to having so many of them together?—Yes; I do think 17 and 18 is quite the limit. The reason I have stretched it to that is the expense. To have fewer girls would be so much greater expense.

15,269. Because, I have heard it stated by people who have knowledge of the subject, that perhaps the best thing for those weak-minded girls is not to be put only with other girls like themselves, but to be put amongst intelligent, bright girls. What do you think of that?—Several of our girls have already been amongst intelligent, bright girls in other homes, and they could not be kept, because they were so dull.

15,270. Do you know any of this class of girls who have had children? I think you said you had had one or two cases where you had taken in those girls?—In our second home we do take those.

15,271. And what about their children?—We don't have any responsibility for the children.

15,272. Where do the children go?—We have only one case where the child is living, and that is taken charge of by a lady.

15,273. And is the child healthy?—He is the most beautiful boy you could see.

15,274. And mentally?—Yes; quite intelligent.

15,275. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) Wouldn't it be a good thing for the mother to have that child?—The mother is incapable of taking charge of him.

15,276. Wouldn't it be a civilising thing to have that child in the home?—Oh, it wouldn't do with the other girls.

15,277. (By Miss Stevenson.) You mentioned, I think, that you had a number of children in your workhouse?—Yes, 160.

15,278. Do you not board out your children?—No; we have cottage homes.

15,279. Do you count as children in the workhouse those in the cottage homes?—The 160 children are in the cottage homes, and the 400 adults in the workhouse.

15,280. That is the same principle as boarding out, only they are under your supervision?—Yes.

15,281. (By the Chairman.) Do the other homes you spoke of in Liverpool, Bristol, and elsewhere, work at the same work as you, or at any variety of work?—They have laundry work. I don't know what else. They don't do this kind of work.

15,282. You spoke of carriage mats. I suppose its the same as those produced?—Yes; but a much larger kind of wool.

15,283. (By Sir Colin Scott Moncrieff.) The worth of the work that the girls can't do is not much, is it?—Yes, it is considerable.

15,284. (By Miss Stevenson.) You could not trust

Miss Agatha Stacey.

- Miss Agatha Stacey.*
 30 Jan. 1895. them to do the clipping along the top?—No; it could not be done even at the homes by the matrons. It is a particular art.
- 15,285. How do you get it done?—I hire a lady to do it, and that takes away from the profits.
- 15,286. How do they wear?—A gentleman in the trade, who saw them at Exeter, said they would wear for four years.
- 15,287. (By Professor Dove Wilson.) Have you ever any trouble with them trying to escape?—No, Miss Agatha Stacey.
 30 Jan. 1895. none at all. Some guardians who were against our work, said they would run away, and it would be no good, it would be no better than having them in the workhouse. But we find they are so perfectly happy that they don't want to run away. We have no difficulty whatever.
- 15,288. Merely moral suasion and good treatment? —Merely moral suasion and love

1. The first part of the document discusses the importance of maintaining accurate records of all transactions and activities. It emphasizes the need for transparency and accountability in financial reporting.

2. The second part of the document outlines the various methods and techniques used to collect and analyze data. It includes a detailed description of the experimental procedures and the statistical analysis performed.

3. The third part of the document presents the results of the study. It includes a series of tables and graphs that illustrate the findings of the research. The data shows a clear trend of increasing activity over time.

4. The fourth part of the document discusses the implications of the findings. It suggests that the results have significant implications for the field of study and may lead to further research in this area.

5. The fifth part of the document concludes the study. It summarizes the main findings and provides a final statement on the importance of the research.

APPENDIX A.

MEMORIAL OF THE CONVENTION OF ROYAL AND PARLIAMENTARY BURGHS, 1887.

The Senior Commissioner for Edinburgh, Bailie Walcott, in the Convention, on 5th April 1887, moved:—

"That in view of the unsatisfactory results at present realised by the "method of dealing with habitual offenders in our Police Courts, this "Convention would earnestly memorialise Her Majesty's Government,
"and petition Parliament to make such alterations in existing laws as "shall substitute for the present system some effectual method of "reformatory treatment."

He said—One of the most familiar and painful facts identified with our Police Courts is the frequent reappearance and recommitment of the same persons. They come and they go, they go and they come, and the lives of some of them are made up of successive changes from their old haunts to the Police Court and the prison. Last year more than half the offenders in the Dundee Court had been previously convicted. By 651 persons 1728 convictions were represented, and 182 of the 651 had been previously convicted from 20 to 190 times. Of the 41,300 apprehended last year in Glasgow, the Chief-Constable is careful to remind us, that in that number the same individuals frequently figure. In Edinburgh the average number during the last six years taken into custody more than once each year is about 1500, and represents 5000 arrests. The average number during the same period taken into custody more than seven times each year is about 70, and represents 800 arrests. In Aberdeen, last year, 252 persons represented 602 convictions. In Leeds, last year, 1819 persons represented at least 6000 arrests. In Manchester, last year, of those arrested for drunkenness, 233 had previously been in custody over 20 times. In Belfast we have the same sad story. In 1877, 10 prisoners in the Belfast jail had recorded against them 1636 convictions; and in 1875 there were in the Irish prisons 1065 prisoners who had been convicted more than 20 times, and who represented 50,000 convictions. These facts are but a sample of what may be obtained from the records of other Police Courts, and prove to us that the evil of frequent recommitments exists to an alarming extent; they reveal much police labour which ought not to be necessary, much irritation which ought not to exist, and much fearful mischief which ought to be prevented. These statements demand serious consideration and decisive action. I do not envy the man who can fairly look them in the face without anxiety and grief. Some change in the mode of dealing with frequent offenders has become absolutely necessary for the good of the community and of the offender.

Many causes contribute their influence to bring about the sad results we are now considering, but amongst these causes our present mode of treatment must be included. Hereditary tendencies, vicious environments, depraved indulgence, a tensionless will, loss of self-respect, the unlawful use of alcoholic drink, and the abounding facilities for obtaining it, are causes which no one can overlook or neglect; this is especially true of drink and the drink traffic; but after giving to each of these their due proportion of influence, there remains a considerable amount which must, I think, be ascribed to defective treatment in our Police Courts. The sentences passed vary from five to thirty days, according to the discretion of the magistrate, or according as he favours or disfavors the principle of cumulative punishment. The full penalty of sixty days is seldom inflicted, however the offence may be aggravated by repetition. As a necessary result of this action, uncertainty and inequality characterise the expected sentence. It has in it so much of the haphazard that we recently read the words of an old offender without surprise—"There is a certain gambling kind of excitement in waiting for the throw of the judicial dice, which may be either six or sixty days." If the dreariness of the police cell is sometimes relieved by excitement of this kind, no one will begrudge the prisoner his excitement, however deeply he may deplore the existence of the cause. Under this see-saw system of short sentences our habitual offenders become familiar with prison life, and lose the wholesome sense of disgrace which they possessed in their first experiences of it. To some it becomes a convenient place of resort, of which, by a little strategy, they can avail themselves for a time, and where they may secure shelter, food, and attendance without cost or labour. Dr. Moore of Belfast tells of one who, when reproached by an official for her groundless complaint, indignantly replied, "What would you and the likes of you do if it were not for me and the likes of me?" Punishment is inflicted not for its own sake, but for the good of the community and of the offender. By it we strive to prevent the repetition of evil, and to reform the evildoer, and yet by our system of oft-repeated short sentences punishment practically ceases to be punishment, and altogether fails to exert either a preventive or a reformatory influence. This failure is indeed to be deplored, for it destroys respect for the administration of law, and works an amount of mischief which it is difficult to estimate. It would be far better to release from the police cell when sober, than to persist in our present course. The question of remedy is undoubtedly beset with difficulties, but not, we think, of such a character that they may not be overcome. Probably in the initial stages it would be found in the adoption of cumulative sentences, that is, sentences in length proportioned to the number of convictions. Many of our chief-constables, and many of the best friends of the offenders, plead for this in the interest of the offender as well as of the community. There is, I think, reason and justice in this proposal. A heavy sentence for a trivial offence has seemed to many of us an incongruous thing, but if five days be reasonable for a person who has offended 200 times, and persistently disregarded its lessons, how can it be reasonable for one who comes only for the fifth time? If the severer sentence will benefit and the lighter one not do so, wisdom and mercy dictate that it should be given. In our criminal courts it is with more or less consistency acted on. It is practically involved in the limitation of the Police Court jurisdiction to two trials for theft or assault, offenders being after that remitted either to the Sheriff or Burgh Court, where generally the sentence is heavier in consideration of previous convictions. In the New Police Bill, section 415, the principle is so far embodied that it may be charged as an aggravation of the offence of being drunk and incapable, if the accused has been convicted four times previously within twelve months. If because of four times the sentence may be more severe, why not severer still if the number reach twelve, and if in previous years the number has to be counted by hundreds? The late Sheriff Hallard, in criticising a bill on this question submitted to him, suggested that Police Magistrates and Sheriffs should in all cases have power to inflict penalties up to six months' hard labour without a jury.

No change in law, however, would meet present requirements which did not provide for some treatment distinctly of a reformatory character. Habitual offenders should be treated as subjects of a moral malady, and sent to some place of confinement where skill, and kindness, and patience shall be exercised to effect a cure. Our infirmaries and hospitals may suggest much. Broken limbs cannot be made whole, fevers and their effects cannot be conquered "without care and time," and to dismiss before the cure is wrought would be as foolish as it would be dangerous. It is this folly and danger we are chargeable with in our treatment of deeper woes, and which we plead may be speedily abandoned. This subject has been discussed for many years. In 1864 the Prison Board of Perth dealt with it, and appealed to other prison boards for co-operation. The Edinburgh Prison Board of Education gave an earnest response to this appeal in an exhaustive and valuable report. In 1866 Lord Rossie (the Earl of Kinnaird) endeavoured to deal with it in a bill. In 1877 it excited much interest in Belfast, and Dr. Moore, the prison surgeon, dealt with it in a pamphlet full of facts and valuable suggestions. In 1883 Mr. D. M'Laren, formerly of Redfern, drew up a memorandum on this subject, which was brought under the notice of the Lord Advocate Balfour. In 1884, writing in reference to this memorandum, Provost Moncur declared his conviction that the importance of the subject was not yet realised by our legislators, and that it must be pressed upon them till some action is taken. In the police reports published for several years past our chief constables have given this subject a prominent position, and earnestly pressed the necessity of dealing with it. It is because, I believe, this demand is well founded and continually increasing that I have ventured to propose the resolution I have read, and ask your adoption of it.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

MEMORIAL FROM NOBLEMEN, PHYSICIANS, LAWYERS,
CLERGYMEN AND OTHERS RESIDENT IN EDINBURGH, GLASGOW, ABERDEEN, DUNDEE AND ALLOA, TO THE MARQUIS OF LOTHIAN, Secretary for Scotland, IN SUPPORT OF PROPOSED RESTORATIVE HOMES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

EDINBURGH, January 1888.

MY LORD,

It will be in your recollection that, in June 1887, you did a Deputation the honour of receiving them in your office in Edinburgh, that they might bring under your notice a Draft Bill bearing the title of The Restorative Homes (Scotland) Bill, the object of which was to make provision for the due restraint of Habitual Drunkards, with a view to their reclamation.

The Deputation at the above time, considering the state of business in Parliament, did not expect that anything could then be done in the way of legislation on this subject. Now, however, we again approach your Lordship regarding it, when a new Session of Parliament is about to commence, and when there is a general hope and expectation that some social questions—of which assuredly the management of Habitual Drunkards is not the smallest in importance—may receive attention from the Legislature.

We beg therefore respectfully to request that your Lordship will again bestow your attention on the proposed measure, and that you will take such steps as to your wisdom may appear proper for bringing the subject under the attention of the Cabinet, with a view to obtaining that amount of Government support which is necessary for securing the object contemplated by the Restorative Homes Bill.

We have the honour to be,

Your Lordship's obedient Servants,

APPENDIX C.

MEMORIAL FORWARDED TO THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY, K.G., AND A COPY OF SAME TO THE MARQUIS OF LOTHIAN.

HABITUAL CRIMINALS, VAGRANTS, BEGGARS, AND INEBRIATES

Unto the Most Honourable The Marquis of SALISBURY, K.G., Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The Memorial of the Committee appointed at a Public Meeting of Citizens in Edinburgh held on the 5th day of June 1891.

Humbly sheweth—

That at said meeting the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz. :—

1. That this Meeting deplores the existence of so large a number of habitual criminals, vagrants, beggars, and inebriates in Scotland, the nature and extent of the evils which they cause, and desires emphatically to express its sense of the need for more effective legislative means in dealing with them, for their own good and in the interests of Society.
2. That this Meeting approves of the following resolution unanimously adopted at a private conference on the subject, and resolves to take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to it. "Inasmuch as the habitually criminal, vagrant, begging, and inebriate classes have become a source of danger and expense to the community, and the present powers possessed by the Magistrates, and the means hitherto employed have proved inadequate to their reclamation, this meeting is of opinion that additional Parliamentary powers are necessary for dealing effectively with them and their children, that they may be prevented from corrupting and oppressing the community.

These powers should embrace (a) Power to place and detain the classes referred to in rural reformatories, at some distance from their present haunts and surroundings, where labour would be provided, and means used for their reclamation. (b) Power to take charge of the children of these classes with a view to save them from vicious and criminal habits, and to fit them for the industries of life, the parents to be obliged to contribute as far as possible towards their support. These ends may be reached either by the amending of the present Acts of Parliament or the passing of new ones."

3. That the following be a Committee to wait on the Lord Advocate and the Secretary for Scotland, and lay the resolutions of the meeting before them and thereafter watch over the whole matter, with a view of securing the necessary legislation, viz. :—

(Here follow the names of Committee.)

That your Memorialists as empowered by the third resolution communicated with the Secretary for Scotland and the Lord Advocate and transmitted to them copies of the resolutions.

That at an interview between the Lord Advocate and the Convener and Honorary Secretary of the Committee of Citizens the objects your Memorialists have in view were discussed and explained, and his Lordship signified his sympathy therewith.

That in the opinion of your Memorialists the time has now come when in the public interest immediate action must be taken on the lines indicated in the second resolution, and with this in view your Memorialists would respectfully submit that the importance of the subject demands the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. At present under existing statutory powers no proceedings can be instituted, nor can any remedy of a permanent character be applied to deal effectively with the question. To ensure that the Government and the country shall be put in possession of the whole facts your Memorialists would respectfully but strongly urge that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the whole subject and report.

Signed in name and by appointment of the Committee at Edinburgh this 31st day of May 1892.

(Signed) J. A. RUSSELL,
Lord Provost.

A Copy of foregoing Memorial was forwarded to the Most Hon. the Marquis of Lothian, Secretary for Scotland, by the Rev. Robert Henderson, M.A., the Honorary Secretary, requesting for it his Lordship's careful consideration.

1 VENTNOR TERRACE,
EDINBURGH, 3rd June 1892.

MY LORD MARQUIS,

At a Public Meeting of Citizens in Edinburgh, held in the City Chambers, Lord Provost Boyd in the chair, on the 5th of June 1891, to consider "How best to deal with Habitual Criminals, Vagrants, Beggars and Inebriates" in the interests of Society and with a view to their reclamation, the accompanying resolutions were unanimously adopted.

In accordance with resolution 3, the Committee appointed communicated with the Secretary for Scotland and Lord Advocate Robertson, enclosing copies of the resolutions and requesting an interview. Their communications were acknowledged.

In January last, the Honorary Secretary had an interview on behalf of the Committee with the Lord Advocate, Sir Charles Pearson, who expressed his sympathy with the objects in view, and advised that a question of such importance should be well considered by the country before legislation was attempted.

The Committee since that time has had the matter before them and come to the conclusion that the only satisfactory way of getting at the facts of the case, so as to secure intelligent public discussion and wise legislation, is the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject and report.

The accompanying Memorial on the subject having been adopted, I now forward a copy of it to your Lordship, assured that you are in sympathy with its objects and will give it your careful consideration.

The Committee are hopeful of a favourable issue to their Memorial. They have reason to believe that all parties in the State are increasingly looking for relief from the present unhappy state of things among this class of the community in the direction indicated.

I am,

My Lord Marquis,

Your Obedient Servant,

ROBERT HENDERSON,
Honorary Secretary.

The Most Honourable
The Marquis of Lothian, K.T.,
Secretary for Scotland.

APPENDIX D.

MINUTE BY COLONEL M'HARDY, R.E., Prison Commissioner, ON THE TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS.

I think this is the most important question of the day in connection with treatment of criminals in Scotland.

The facts are very clearly set out by the papers in—

There exists in the country a considerable number of people who frequently reappear at the Police Courts charged with minor crimes, especially those of drunkenness, breaches of the peace, &c., and who, under the existing law, are dealt with by frequently repeated short sentences of imprisonment, which evidently fail in producing any deterrent effect.

These persons cause—

- 1st. Immense trouble to Magistrates, Police and Prison Officials.
- 2nd. Considerable disturbance in the poorer districts of Cities and Towns; and
- 3rd. Largely prevent the improvement in the social state which is the great endeavour of modern government.

The need for dealing in some way with the matter is the more pressing because it is found that while crimes of more serious character are either stationary or on the decline, offences of the kind above described are increasing. One fact may suffice as to this point: the increase in apprehensions and citations in Scotland within the last twenty years has been 18,000. So entirely is this due to minor offences, that had it not been for the increase in petty assaults, &c., there would have been a decrease in the apprehensions and citations of 2000.

It is no doubt satisfactory that the increase is not in the serious crimes, but that does not remove the necessity for, in some way, trying to check the number of petty offences, which are on the increase.

(A paper cutting from The Scotsman is annexed, and shows in some detail the actual facts of the case.)

The trouble caused in the neighbourhood of the abode of the habitual offender, and the increased duty thrown on the Police, are well set out in the minutes of the Chief-Constables of Edinburgh and Dundee in—, both of these officials being as good authorities as could be obtained on the subject.

The work imposed on the Governors of Prisons and their officers by the coming and going of Habitual Offenders, can be readily testified to by every officer of position in the Prison Department.

Assuming, then, that the facts are admitted, the question arises as to how a new departure in dealing with the class referred to should be carried out.

The various methods suggested are as follows:—

- (a) Adult Reformatories.
- (b) Utilisation of special wards in Poorhouses.
- (c) Boarding-out or dispersion.
- (d) Increase in the length of sentence on re-conviction.
- (e) Amendment in the law for committing to Reformatories.

When such variety of view exists, it appears desirable that all the facts should be examined by some Committee or Commission to determine which is best.

My own opinion is that, with the exception of Adult Reformatories, all the other methods might with advantage be used, and full discretion left in the hands of the Magistrate.

(a) As regards Adult Reformatories, the country would certainly hesitate at this time of day, when it is quite common to see benevolent residential institutions broken up, to incur a large outlay in new buildings, managed by expensive staffs.

Besides, I think we are justified in doubting if the result would be satisfactory. Perth Penitentiary was created in 1842, to a great extent on the lines of an Adult Reformatory, but the experience derived was certainly not encouraging. It may be said that there would be more association and freedom in these proposed Adult Reformatories than there was at Perth; but, if this were so, it would not be expected that these offenders would learn from each other much good by intercourse with each other, and probably a good deal of harm might thereby be done.

The failure of the "intermediate" system as worked out at Lusk, in Ireland, is also fresh in the minds of those acquainted with treatment of criminals.

(b) Captain Monro proposes to consign habitual offenders to special wards of poorhouses, while the late Lord Advocate quite disapproves of such a suggestion. Nevertheless, there are a great many individuals who spend, more or less, all their lives either in the prison or poorhouse, going to the latter when not "able-bodied," and leaving it when they think they are able-bodied. Of these persons there are certainly some who might, with great advantage to the community, be detained by the Poorhouse Authorities as not able-bodied, if the necessary power existed, and I believe these authorities would readily use such power. I would therefore let a recommendation be laid before a Magistrate, who would be able to issue an order for detention in a poorhouse.

(c) For many habitual offenders a treatment similar to that of paupers and lunatics who are boarded out would be wise and economical. The individual would, under this plan, be placed under the care of selected common-sense people, with a conditional liberty similar to that granted to convicts at present. In this way an opportunity would be given for reformation to go on under the ordinary conditions of life, a condition which appears very necessary, if permanent good is to be done. Such dispersed offenders might be protected in their district, where they were known, by making it penal to supply them with drink, in the same way as the police are protected at present.

(d) For those who were not found amenable to the treatment just described, or totally unfit for it, the prison with a prolonged sentence would remain, and would, in some of the worst cases, provide adequate deterrent effect within the range of two years' imprisonment.

With regard to any new method of reformation proposed, it would be a necessity for its success, to take care that no additional burden was laid on the local rates, as the charges might not be fairly cast on the particular town selected by the habitual offender as a residence.

Also, behind any reformatory treatment, a well-organised system of migration or emigration should be developed for the settlement of such offenders as gave satisfactory proof that they had really entered on a better life.

APPENDIX E.

LETTER FROM COLONEL M'HARDY, R.E., WITH STATISTICS AS TO PERCENTAGE OF IMPRISONMENTS TO POPULATION IN ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND RESPECTIVELY.

143 PRINCES STREET,
EDINBURGH, 1st December 1893.

SIR,

With reference to your letter (S. 8570/1), dated 9th September 1893, on the subject of the number of imprisonments in Scotland, I have the honour here-with to forward figures taken from the Returns published this year, showing the number of cases dealt with by the Police, and the percentage of imprisonments to population in Scotland, England, and Ireland; also the numbers of cases of disorderly conduct, and drunkenness, both actual and relative, to population in the three countries.

The figures speak for themselves, and show the excessive number of imprisonments which are inflicted in Scotland in comparison with England, and even Ireland. There can be little doubt that the governing factor in the Scottish Returns is the enormous number of imprisonments due to disorderly conduct and drunkenness. It will be seen that for these offences, 33,147 were last year imprisoned in Scotland. In Ireland the total number of commitments for every sort of crime and offence was just about the same figure, viz., 36,253.

These facts may be of use to the Secretary for Scotland in dealing with the movement now on foot for treating habitual offenders in some way other than by imprisonment.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your Most Obedient Servant,

A. B. M'HARDY.

The Under Secretary for Scotland.

APPENDIX F.

LETTER FROM COLONEL M'HARDY, R.E., WITH RELATIVE STATEMENTS AS TO PROPORTION OF PRISONERS TO POPULATION IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND RESPECTIVELY.

EDINBURGH, 7th January 1892.

SIR,

I have the honour to submit, for the information of the Secretary for Scotland, the following facts in connection with Punishment by Imprisonment in Scotland and England.

The substance of this letter has been brought under the notice of the Prison Commissioners, but they are of opinion that the subject is not one which properly belongs to their Department. I am therefore led personally to place the matter before His Lordship, because I have found that the facts of the case, though they have been hitherto overlooked, are somewhat startling, and they seem of sufficient importance to deserve the consideration of the officer charged with the administration of Scottish affairs.

The last Report of the Prison Commissioners for Scotland showed that there was a rise in the numbers of ordinary prisoners, while the English Report indicated that the numbers were still falling in England; also the same returns show that the total decrease in the daily average of prisoners in England since 1879, stands to that in Scotland in the proportion of 67 to 49.

In trying to discover why the prison population was falling more quickly in England than Scotland, I came upon the remarkable fact that in Scotland (in proportion to population) nearly twice and a half times as many people are sent to prison every year as in England, i.e., for every two persons sent to prison in England five are so committed in Scotland.

This state of affairs can be seen at once by inspecting the Returns given in the Scottish and English Prison Reports for 1890-91, pages 5 and 1 respectively.

		Approximate Population, 1890.	Commitments to Prison.	Rate per 1,000 of Population.
Scotland,	. .	4,003,350	47,571*	11·8
England,	. .	28,698,360	142,158†	4·9

If any one tries to examine into the causes which lead to this result, he will be met by considerable difficulties; for it is not easy to see why the law in the two countries acts so differently. It is, however, possible to discover something about the classes of prisoners which go to swell the numbers in the Scottish Criminal Returns.

For instance, if we turn from the commitments to the recorded daily averages of prisoners in custody, we find that Scotland and England are in that respect proportionately almost equal. The figures for 1890-91 are:—

		Daily Average.	Per 1,000 of Population.
Scotland,	. .	‡1,952	·48
England,	. .	‡12,812	·44

While then the commitments to prison are proportionately twice and a half times more numerous in Scotland than in England, the average daily numbers in custody are in proportion equal. It clearly follows that the average sentence of persons committed to prison in England is twice and a half times as long as in Scotland. Therefore the large number of committals in Scotland is not caused by long sentences, but by many short sentences.

* Criminal Lunatics are excepted,
† Debtors are excepted,

This is confirmed if we examine the sentences of those in custody in the respective countries. For example, in 1890-91, the percentage of those in prison who had sentences of one month or under was :—

	Males.	Females.
Scotland, . . .	33·6 per cent.	59·7 per cent.
England, . . .	19·4 „	37·0 „

It will be therefore safe to say that a great part of the huge preponderance of commitments in Scotland is due to a large number of short sentences.

As regards the more serious crimes, the Judicial Statistics show that the number of persons convicted on indictment is proportionately greater in Scotland than in England; but the difference, though large, is not so enormous as is the case with the numbers of the total committals to prison, referred to above. The figures are as follows for 1890 :—

Number of Prisoners convicted on Indictment per 10,000 of the population.

England,	3·2

These indicted prisoners have all more or less long sentences of imprisonment or penal servitude, and so would naturally raise the daily average numbers in custody in Scotland to some extent; but this tendency is counteracted, for it has been shown that the daily average number is the same in Scotland as in England. In fact, it seems clear that the short sentences in Scotland are so numerous, that they entirely swamp any effect which the larger number of sentences for indictable crimes would naturally produce on the daily average.

(It may be noted in passing that the committals to Penal Servitude in Scotland and England were from July 1889 to July 1890 :—

Scotland 2·4 per 100,000 of population,
England 2·3 per 100,000 of population.)

I do not propose to burden this letter with more figures, for those already given show that in Scotland we have immensely greater numbers put into prison than in England, and a great many for very short periods. As I do not believe that good results follow from short imprisonments (sometimes frequently repeated), nor that Scottish require prison discipline more than Englishmen, I should be glad to see the commitments to prison in Scotland reduced to at least the same proportion as in England.

If the Secretary for Scotland concurs, it might be suggested to His Lordship that the foregoing facts should be brought to the knowledge of the Magistrates in Scotland, especially to those of the large cities, and inquiry might be made to discover (1) if persons convicted are allowed reasonable opportunity of finding means to pay fines when inflicted, (2), if, in every case where it seems warranted, time is allowed for fines to be paid, and (3) if the police forces are paid more in Scotland than in England for escorting into custody prisoners after sentence.

I have attached some Tables which have been prepared with the help of Mr Donaldson and the staff of the Prison Commission Secretariat.

I have the honour to be,

Your obedient Servant,

A. B. M'HARDY.

The Under Secretary for Scotland.

APPENDIX G.

MINUTE OF LORD ADVOCATE BALFOUR ON PROPORTION OF PRISONERS TO POPULATION IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND RESPECTIVELY.

Colonel M'Hardy's very interesting letter of 7th January 1892, appears to bring out four points, viz. :—

- (1) That the commitments to prison are proportionately two and a half times more numerous in Scotland than in England.
- (2) That the average daily numbers in custody in the two countries are almost proportionately equal.
- (3) That the number of persons convicted on indictment is proportionately greater in Scotland than in England, in the ratio of 4·6 to 3·2; and
- (4) That the committals to penal servitude in the two countries are proportionately almost equal.

I do not think that the facts stated afford ground for inferring that there is proportionately more crime, even of the smaller kinds, in Scotland than in England. It is well known, and is generally, if not universally, admitted in England, that the system of public prosecution which prevails in Scotland, and the official machinery, which is to be found in every part of that country, lead to a much more effective detection and punishment of crime than exist in England, where private prosecution is the rule. Persons who have studied the subject have usually agreed that it would be an advantage to introduce the system of public prosecution into England, as at once tending to secure the conviction and punishment of the guilty, and the protection of the innocent, and the reason for not introducing that system has, I understand, been the great expense which it would entail, and the difficulty of establishing and controlling by a central authority, the very numerous official staff which would be required for so large and populous a country as England.

It is to be noticed that the commitments to penal servitude are almost proportionately equal in the two countries, pointing to the conclusion that the gravest crime, not punished by death, is not more common in Scotland than in England. But the gravest crime is that which would most certainly be prosecuted under any system, and I understand that the prosecution of such crime is very frequently undertaken by the public authorities in England, as it always is in Scotland.

The trials upon indictment would include not only crimes proper to be punished by penal servitude [i.e., the most serious crimes not punished by death], but also crimes of less gravity, which would be appropriately punished by imprisonment. This last category would probably include many crimes not of sufficient gravity to be prosecuted by the public authorities in England, and consequently not a few crimes of this class would, I should suppose, not be prosecuted at all there, while they would be in Scotland. It appears to me that this is probably the explanation of the fact that the number of prisoners convicted on indictment is proportionately greater [by more than a fourth] in Scotland than in England; while the committals to penal servitude in the two countries are proportionately equal.

The like considerations may explain the very large proportionate excess of committals for short terms in Scotland over that in England. Petty offences would not be much taken up by the public authorities in England; and private parties, who had suffered from such offences [e.g., thefts of articles of no great value, and slight assaults], would not undertake the trouble and cost of instituting prosecutions in respect of them. This is well illustrated by the fact that one often sees from reports in English newspapers, that persons making charges of the less grave offences, are bound over by the Magistrate to prosecute, the assumption being that if they were not so bound over they would not prosecute, and the offenders would go free.

The fact that the proportion of commitments in respect of crimes not tried by indictment,—i.e., of the minor crimes,—is so much larger in Scotland than in England would naturally make the average duration of sentences shorter in the former than in the latter country. I do not suggest that this explains more than partially what Colonel M'Hardy points out as to the relative length of sentences in Scotland and England respectively. For the rest, I am not aware how the general run of sentences for the same class of crimes compare in Scotland and in England, or whether the average sentences in Scotland may be by some persons considered too short. Sentences have certainly, within my recollection, become shorter for the more serious crimes, and there are few questions as to which there is a sharper difference of opinion, than in regard to the efficacy of long and short sentences. While short sentences may not be so punitive or deterrent, they do not bring about the listlessness, helplessness, deprivation of energy and capacity for earning an honest livelihood, which too often result from long sentences.

APPENDIX H.

PETITION, re HABITUAL DRUNKARDS, PRESENTED TO SIR,
GEORGE O. TREVELYAN, IN GLASGOW, NOVEMBER 1892,
BY BAILIE CHISHOLM.

To the Right Honourable SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, BART., M.P., Secretary of State for Scotland. The humble petition of the Glasgow Committee met to consider the question of Habitual Drunkards

Showeth as follows:—

That in Scotland 151,480 apprehensions, or 1 to 26 of the population (England 1 to 39), have been made during the year, and that of this total, 110,700 apprehensions, or 73 per cent. (England 38 per cent.), were made for "drunkenness" (drunk and incapable), "disorderly conduct," "breach of the peace."

That of the 151,480 apprehensions, 47,190, or 1 to 85 of the population, were committed to prison (England 1 to 180).

That the ratio of commitment per 1000 of the population in Scotland is—males 6·8, females 4·2 (England—males 4·1, females, 1·5).

That the 47,190 (males 29,800, females 17,370) commitments represent about 23,000 individuals (males 17,000, females 6000), and that of the males 18 per cent.; had been committed 6 times and up to 100 times; of the females 51 per cent.

That for every male there are four female habituals.

That in Glasgow 57,120 apprehensions were made in the course of the year, or 10 per cent. of population; Greenock, 5,495, or 8·7 per cent.; Govan, 2,720, or 4·5 per cent.; Edinburgh, 11,030, or 4·3 per cent.; Dundee, 5,874, or 3·8 per cent. (Liverpool, 10 per cent.; Manchester, 4·5 per cent.; Birmingham, 3·2 per cent.; Newcastle, 5·8 per cent.).

That in Glasgow 80 per cent. of the apprehensions, or 1 to 12 of population, were for being "drunk and incapable," "disorderly," "breaches of the peace," "simple assaults" and "prostitution"; Edinburgh, 79 per cent., or 1 to 30 of population; Govan, 77 per cent., or 1 to 29; Dundee, 67 per cent., or 1 to 38; Greenock, 66 per cent., or 1 to 17 (Liverpool, 36 per cent., or 1 to 28; Manchester 41 per cent., or 1 to 54, Birmingham, 35 per cent., or 1 to 87; Newcastle, 42 per cent., or 1 to 41).

That under General and Special Police Acts, brief sentences of hours up to a few days for individuals repeatedly convicted of the offences enumerated are neither preventive, deterrent, nor reformatory, and that an average sentence of 5 days in Scotland and Ireland, or 8 days in England for the same kind of offence does not admit of reformation from long-standing depravity.

That in the cities and towns of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Greenock, Govan, and other provincial towns, there are a large number of habituals convicted times without number of "drunkenness," "importuning," "disorderly conduct," and "breach of the peace," and that frequency of conviction is 50 per cent. greater among women than men.

That in the towns and cities enumerated above, men and women have been convicted and sentenced from tens up to hundreds of times for the same offence.

That the names of habituals can be given who have been convicted one, two, three, four, five and six hundred times, and that in the cities those with such a deplorable record range from 2 up to 7 per cent.

That in one year, and this is even more startling, there are a number of individuals convicted of drunkenness, 30 up to 40 times, and a larger number 6 up to 30 times each.

That during the past year in Glasgow, where the commitments to prison of women exceed that of any other prison in the Kingdom—the number being 10,500; 400 women were sent to prison 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and up to 34 times (45 of these on an average were committed 20 times), and that these 400, or 10 per cent. of the 4000 women represented by these 10,500 commitments, were responsible for 4000 commitments, or 40 per cent. of the whole.

That from the figures above quoted, and the strongly expressed opinions of those who are familiar with, and have investigated the matter, it is abundantly clear that the system of dealing with these habituals has utterly broken down after extended trial, and that a change in the police regulations for dealing with these wretched beings is imperatively demanded.

That it is plain that a system which enables a magistrate to send a man or woman to jail for 6 up to 40 times in one year, and hundreds of times in a few years, not only carries condemnation on its face, but is unfair to the habituals themselves.

That these habituals come into prison after a debauch, the effects of which have hardly passed off before they are at liberty to repeat with impunity the offence for which they have so frequently been convicted.

That it can be shown, beyond dispute, that these habituals look upon the jails as national Sanatoria, in which they can sojourn for a brief period without performing any but the most perfunctory work—their condition, in many cases, not admitting of labour.

That in the case of women, more especially, the system encourages the propagation of a progeny with inherited mental and physical defects, accentuated in all cases by the most unfavourable surroundings.

That on all these grounds it is abundantly evident that the system of dealing with habitual inebriates and others convicted of allied offences, has utterly broken down, and that in the interests of society, of economy, of those miserable creatures themselves, their children and dependants, it is a matter of urgent national importance that all needful evidence should be collected and sifted, and the facts ascertained publicly by an impartial body, such as a Royal Commission, from witnesses who can throw light on the question, or who may be called upon by the Commission to give evidence with the view of discovering better and more rational methods of dealing with these habituals.

Your Petitioners, therefore, humbly pray the Right Honourable the Secretary for Scotland that he will appoint a Royal Commission with special reference to the above statements and others.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Signed on behalf of the Committee and Meeting,

24th November 1892.

MEMORIAL FORWARDED TO SIR GEORGE O. TREVELYAN,
BART., M.P., MAY 1893.ASSOCIATION FOR THE RECLAMATION OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS, VAGRANTS, BEGGARS, AND INEBRIATES.

Unto the Right Honourable Sir GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Baronet, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Scotland.

The Memorial of the Conference of Representatives from the Scottish Town Councils of Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Greenock, and Perth, the Convention of Royal Burghs, the Glasgow Committee on Habitual Drunkards, the Glasgow Association for Improving the Social Condition of the People, the Parochial Boards of Edinburgh and Glasgow, the British Women's Temperance Association, and the Edinburgh Association for the Reclamation of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates.

Humbly sheweth—

That this Conference, in common with all thoughtful citizens, views with alarm the enormous and increasing number of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates, in Scotland, which it regards as a source of great danger and expense to the community; it feels that the powers possessed by the Magistrates are inadequate to cope with the evil, and considers that additional Parliamentary powers are necessary.

Your Memorialists would respectfully yet urgently submit that the importance of the subject demands the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. At present under existing statutory powers no proceedings can be instituted, nor can any remedy of a permanent character be applied to deal effectively with these classes.

To ensure that the Government and the country shall be put in possession of the whole facts necessary to the framing of remedial measures, previous to attempting legislation, your Memorialists would respectfully but strongly urge that a Royal Commission should be appointed to collect information, and inquire into the subject, and report.

Signed in the name of the Conference, at Edinburgh, this 17th day of May 1893.

Chairman.

MEMORIAL FROM ABERDEEN FORWARDED TO SIR GEORGE
O. TREVELYAN, BART., M.P.

RECLAMATION OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

To the Right Honourable SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Bart., M.P., Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Scotland: The Memorial of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of the City and Royal Burgh of Aberdeen,

Humbly sheweth—

1. That the Memorialists desire to draw attention to the existence and continued increase of the number of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates.

2. In the opinion of the Memorialists, the existence of such a class cannot but be regarded as a source of danger, as well as of expense, to the community; and the Memorialists humbly submit that the powers at present possessed by the Magistracy are inadequate to cope with the evil, and that additional powers are required for dealing effectively with the classes in question, and rescuing them and their children from vicious, immoral, and criminal habits.

3. The Memorialists venture to urge that the importance of the subject demands the intervention of Her Majesty's Government, and to point out that, under the existing state of the law, no remedy of a permanent character can be applied for dealing effectively with the classes referred to.

4. At a meeting of the Memorialists held on 20th February 1893, the following resolution was adopted, viz. :—

“That a Memorial be addressed by the Town Council to Her Majesty's Government drawing their attention to the necessity which exists for “the reclamation of habitual offenders, vagrants, beggars, and inebriates,
“and urging the appointment of a Royal Commission for the purpose “of instituting an inquiry, and reporting as to the remedial measures to “be adopted for dealing with the question.”

5. The Memorialists, therefore, respectfully request that Her Majesty's Government will be pleased to appoint a Royal Commission for the purpose indicated in the resolution in question.

Signed in name and on behalf of the Town Council of Aberdeen this 6th day of March 1893.

DAVID STEWART,
Lord Provost of Aberdeen.

APPENDIX K.

ANALYSIS OF RESTORATIVE HOMES (SCOTLAND), BILL. DRAFTED BY THE LATE MR CHARLES MORTON, W.S.

NOTE.—This analysis is extracted from a pamphlet published by Messrs Oliver and Boyd under the title “Habitual Drunkards.”

CLAUSE 1. provides for repeal of existing Inebriates Acts, so far as relates to Scotland.

2. The Restorative Homes (Scotland) Act.

3. “District homes,” premises, other than a lunatic asylum, licensed under this Act, under the management of District Boards of Lunacy.

“Superintendent,” manager or principal officer of a district home, and the licensed owner or owners of a licensed private home, and any manager or other principal officer appointed by him for the management thereof.

“Sheriff,” the sheriff and sheriff-substitute of county of patient's residence, and also sheriff of county where home is situated.

4 and 5. The Board of Commissioners in Lunacy to inquire of each district board whether separate district homes, or one general district home, or one or more private homes, should be established, and to report to the Secretary for Scotland, who can order the Board to carry out their decision. The report and the Scottish Secretary's order to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. If no objection in Parliament during 40 days, the Scottish Secretary's order to take effect. Estimates for sites, equipment, &c., of homes to be subject to approval by general board, the work being executed under the management of the district board.

6. The necessary charges for the establishment and carrying on of approved homes to be borne on the landward part of counties and upon the burghs (if for one general district home) of all Scotland (if for a separate district home) of the district, according to the real rent of the lands and heritages. The proposed assessments to be raised under the same Acts as the assessment for lunacy establishments.

7. Board empowered to grant a licence for general or separate district home.

8. When patient is from another district, district board to have power to charge proportion of cost to district of patient's prior residence.

9 and 10. District homes to be vested in the district board, which board can acquire lands and borrow on security of the assessment.

11. Private homes may be licensed by district board on payment of a fee of £2 to the Board.

12. Board to frame rules and regulations for district and private homes, for medical attendance, &c., also for scales of payment for patients not entering voluntarily, subject to approval by the Scottish Secretary.

13 and 14. Secretary to appoint an Inspector with salary. Each home to be inspected at least twice a year.

15. Register of patients, along with such other books as Board may direct, to be kept. A copy of register to be transmitted in each December to the Board.

16. Provides for admission (and detention for a limited time) to a home on voluntary application. The superintendent, within two days of admission, to report to the Board. The superintendent of a private home may make special arrangements for board and fees. If no such agreement, the schedule charges to be eligible.

17. If patient refuses to apply voluntarily, any member of his family, or any other near relative, or a friend taking interest in him, or a magistrate in the public interest, may present an application to the sheriff to grant an order for reception and detention in a district or private home. The application to be accompanied by a Statutory Declaration by the applicant, and, if the patient have such friends, by a Statutory Declaration by two private friends, who shall have personally seen him within seven days, and also a certificate on soul and conscience by a registered medical practitioner, who shall have seen patient within seven days. If the patient have no private friends, there must be two medical certificates. The application may be for reception into a home and for detention for a period not exceeding twelve months. On receiving the order from the sheriff, the applicant, with the assistance (if necessary), of any of the attendants of the home, or of officers of the law, can remove the patient to the home. The Board to fix the scale of payment when there is no private arrangement.

18. Any patient can at any time apply to the Board by letter, or to the sheriff by petition. The Board and the sheriff have both power to grant or refuse a discharge, subject to review by the Superior Courts. The patient can also apply to the Secretary for Scotland.

19. Patient, unless discharged by the Board, the sheriff, a superior court, or the Secretary, shall be detained for twelve months. The Board may postpone discharge for an additional three months on application, either from original applicant or from any relative, with the consent of the persons who made the relative declarations. The Board may also dismiss any patient for insubordination, misconduct, disobedience to regulations, disturbance or annoyance to the officers or inmates of the house.

20. Patient and his estate liable for patient's board and treatment in district and private homes, and for all contingent expenses, as decreed for by the sheriff on a summary petition by applicant, superintendent, or guarantor.

21. The Board can transfer a patient from one home to another.

22. The Board may grant occasional leave of absence, subject to withdrawal. In the event of escape, any justice or magistrate with jurisdiction in place where patient is found, or in the district from which he escaped, can, on summary application by the superintendent, issue a warrant for the apprehension of the patient; and after apprehension, the patient shall be taken back to the home.

23. Any person aiding a patient to escape, or supplying anyone known to such person as being an inmate of a licensed "home" with wine, beer, spirits, or other alcoholic stimulant (unless by order of the medical attendant), shall be liable to a penalty of £10, on application of the superintendent to the sheriff or a justice of the peace.

24. A penalty not exceeding £20 for any officer or attendant failing to comply with the provisions of the Act, or supplying stimulants or narcotics (except by order of the medical attendant) to any patient.

The Board may revoke a licence to a private home if the licensee prove to be unqualified or negligent.

25. The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act to be incorporated with this Act.

26. Power to members of the Board and inspectors to visit all district and private homes, and to employ medical advice and assistance. Such expenses to be charged to the Board.

27. The sheriff and any of the visiting justices can visit and inspect homes.

28. Any minister of the parish, and the patient's own minister, also any relative, can visit under such conditions as superintendent and medical attendant, with sanction of the Board, lay down.

29 to 31. No action to lie against any medical or other persons for applications, certificates, or declarations, unless on specific averment of falsehood and malice, or of reckless and careless granting without inquiry, and of being untrue and unwarrantable. No action can be laid after the expiry of six months after the patient's discharge. No action to lie against the Commissioners, or against a superintendent of a district or private home, or occupant or owner of a private home, or against any attendant, acting under orders of the sheriff or the Board. No document to be invalid for defect in form.

APPENDIX L.

LETTER AND NOTES BY SIR ARTHUR MITCHELL, K.C.B.

IN REFERENCE TO

34 DRUMMOND PLACE,
EDINBURGH, 20th February 1887

DEAR MR MORTON,

I have carefully considered your Restorative Homes (Scotland) Draft Bill, and I append some Notes which show the direction of my views, and which I hope may be of use to you.

Such a measure as the Notes indicate to be in my mind would be one of eight or ten clauses, and much narrower than yours.

What I have written is the expression of my private opinion, which you no doubt invited in consequence of the evidence I gave to the Select Committee of the House of Commons—1872—on Habitual Drunkards. I shall be glad if you show the Notes to Dr Peddie, Sir Douglas Maclagan, and Professor Grainger-Stewart. What I have said in them is merely an application to the proposals in your Draft Bill of what I have already said and published. It seems to me absolutely necessary to keep clearly and constantly in view the opinions expressed in the two articles on "The Relations of Drink to Insanity," which I sent to you for perusal.

I am glad you have acted on my suggestion and have sent your Draft Bill to the Board of Lunacy for their opinion regarding it. It was necessary, I think, to do this, because you give the Board so prominent a position in the Bill, and give it also quite new duties.

You have undertaken a very difficult task, and you are sure to have many discouragements and disappointments. But if a man of your knowledge and ability rises above these, and holds on to the question "with both your hands and all your teeth," we shall by-and-by understand it better, and see all the ins and outs of it more clearly. If there ought to be legislation on the subject, you are the man to get it; and if there ought not to be legislation, we shall all know why, and shall give our assent, when you retire from the fight.

With sincere respect, I am, faithfully yours,

ARTHUR MITCHELL.

Charles Morton, Esq., W.S.

NOTES.

Description of the Persons in regard to whom Legislation is sought.

There is a form of insanity which is held by—what may be correctly described as—the whole body of the medical profession to be recognisable with as much ease and as much certainty as other forms of insanity; but the Lunacy Laws are not applicable to it, and from its nature it requires to be, and ought to be dealt with by a special law, for the reason that persons labouring under it cannot be said to have recovered from it, or to be free from it, though there may be no detectable evidence of intellectual disorder in them. This form of insanity has excessive indulgence in intoxicants as an essential feature; but it is not the well-defined form of insanity known as delirium tremens, nor is it the equally well-defined form of insanity known as mania à potu, nor is it the form of insanity which temporarily exists in the case of every person who is drunk or intoxicated. All these forms of insanity depend on the excessive indulgence in intoxicants, but they either do not require to be dealt with as insanity, in consequence of their transitoriness, or if, from exceptional severity or any other cause, they do require to be dealt with as insanity, then the ordinary Lunacy Laws reach them. But in the case of the form of insanity now in question, and for which you desire special legislation, the excessive use of intoxicants has distinctive features. It is a private or secret indulgence in intoxicants, in the sense of not being a convivial indulgence in them, and the indulgence occurs in fits or with remissions, these fits being nearly, if not completely, as over-mastering, or dominating, as are fits of maniacal excitement or fits of melancholia in persons subject to fits of mania or melancholia. Persons labouring under this form of insanity exhibit also a change of character. It is difficult to describe this change, but it is marked by a tendency to regard themselves as objects of interest on whose behalf sacrifices are properly and naturally made, and by a habit of talking from a high standpoint, and with none of the humility which their own conduct ought to beget in them, about the behaviour of others—about people, for instance, who are not industrious or who are extravagant. This or some similar change of character I believe to be always present in the persons who labour under the special form of insanity for which special legislation is desired. It is almost essential, I think, that there shall be a change of character.

The persons for whom legislation is desired are thus persons in a fairly definite condition. Their number is not so great as it is generally supposed to be, and, in my opinion, they belong largely to the well-to-do class of society.

The point of importance is that they can be defined and recognised; and I leave it to you as a lawyer to give them a suitable name, and to make it clear in the Interpretation Clause what that name means. I have endeavoured to furnish you with material for doing this, but I do not expect that you will find the task an easy one.

Purposes to be served by the Legislation which is sought.

Legislation is desired in the interest of those persons who labour under the form of insanity referred to, in order that they may be submitted to the only kind of treatment which, so far as is known, can effect a cure in their cases; but, like legislation which concerns ordinary lunatics, it is also desired in the interest of those who are injured by such persons—in other words, in order to give the healthy the power of protecting themselves against the unhealthy. This double purpose should be fully and freely acknowledged.

It should be frankly avowed, that we are not yet in possession of any facts satisfactorily showing that prolonged compulsory abstinence from intoxicants will cure persons who labour under this special form of insanity. A priori reasoning makes it probable that it would have that effect; and we shall not be able to say more than this till the making of the necessary experiments is legalised. We cannot tell what good may be done by prolonged abstinence till we have the power of enforcing it.

As regards the comforts and advantages which the seclusion of persons in this special state of insanity would often bring to their friends, there cannot be any doubt.

A Power to take away Liberty the Essence of the Measure.

The power of taking away liberty in the case of persons labouring under this form of insanity is the essence of the proposed measure. It is by far its largest feature, and will not be easily obtained. The arguments against giving it are strong. It seems to me that it can only be reasonably asked on the ground that the condition of the persons in question is a special form of insanity. The law has already settled that the liberty of ordinary insane persons may be taken away, and this measure should proceed on the idea that there is a special insanity not reached by the present law; that it ought to be possible to take away the liberty of persons labouring under that form of insanity; and that this ought to be done, as in the case of ordinary insanity, without implying punishment or criminality. If in taking away their liberty there is any thought of punishing bad conduct, that is, if they are not dealt with as diseased persons, then a completely different measure should be proposed.

Who should order the taking away of Liberty?

If the power of taking away the liberty of the persons in question is granted, by whom ought that power to be exercised? Who ought to grant the Order authorising the loss of liberty? In the case of ordinary lunatics, the Order is granted by Sheriffs-Principal and Sheriffs-Substitute; that is, by persons empowered to take away liberty for other reasons than that of lunacy. I cannot see why the granting of the Order in the case of persons labouring under this special form of insanity should be entrusted to persons in a different position. Indeed, it seems to me, that in their case it is even more desirable to make it plain that the Order has been granted by some one who holds a high position as a Judge, and who is accustomed to weigh evidence. I should see a propriety, indeed, in making the Sheriffs-Principal the only persons who can give such Orders in regard to them.

The persons empowered to grant Orders should do so on a petition, statement, and certificates in writing, and they should have the fullest power possible to make the evidence thus furnished satisfactory, by such things as calling for further statements—calling for additional certificates from medical men whom they may name, or from persons who are not medical men—requiring persons to appear before them—communicating with the person whose liberty they are asked to take away—by doing, in short, whatever seems necessary to justify the granting of the Order craved. If the petitioner does not choose to do all the Sheriff asks, he can withdraw the petition.

It ought to be clearly kept in view that the persons who are to lose their liberty under a measure of this kind do not exhibit the disorder of the intellect which friends and neighbours readily see and readily acknowledge in ordinary lunatics; that their state of insanity is not so plain; and that the evidence establishing its existence cannot be so briefly and easily given. That evidence, however, need not differ in kind, though probably it should always differ in amount. It may be given in writing, like the evidence on which a Sheriff grants his order to transmit and detain in the case of an ordinary lunatic, and I believe it to be quite possible to make it complete and satisfactory in that form.

How are Establishments to be provided?

If the power to take away liberty is granted, and the persons to give Orders for taking it away are decided on, then where are those who so lose their liberty to be detained?

In view of what I have said about our want of knowledge regarding the curative effects of prolonged compulsory abstinence from intoxicants in case of persons labouring under this special form of insanity, it scarcely seems to me to be justifiable to ask Parliament to authorise assessments for the purpose of providing the Establishments in which such persons may be detained under care and treatment. It seems to me that nothing more should be asked than a power to license Establishments provided by charitable organisations, bequests, or private enterprise. It would perhaps be a good and reasonable proposal that the Board of Lunacy should be utilised as the licensing and supervising authority over such Establishments.

In regard to Establishments, I think it doubtful whether any legislation should be asked beyond what is tentative and permissive. If good is unmistakably done by the Establishments which spring up under such legislation, there will in after years be little difficulty in obtaining its amendment and extension.

Provisions of Bill do not tend to Reduce Drunkenness.

Legislation such as the Bill contemplates has no tendency, so far as I can see, to reduce drunkenness, except by making its possible consequences disagreeable.

Good in this direction, it seems to me, can only be found by punishing persons who drink to intoxication, and by punishing them severely if they do so often. I refer to ordinary convivial drinking to excess, from which it is as easy to abstain as from thieving, and which is not the outcome of a state of disease. I shall not go further, and disclose my views about our present licensing arrangements, which foster "Whisky Palaces," "Buffets," and establishments of that kind, having a garish air of respectability that makes persons of the lower professional and upper artisan class—the backbone of society—not ashamed to enter them. We repress the "solicitations" of gaudily-dressed loose women, but we practically encourage the "solicitations" of flaring whisky palaces. Nor shall I say anything about Local Option proposals, which would intensify the evils that exist, by adding still more to the showiness of the surroundings in which intoxicants are sold. I know I am in a minority in the views I hold on this subject, but I do not think any one can show that my views are not in harmony with true liberalism.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION FOR THE CURE AND CONTROL OF HABITUAL DRUNKARDS. BY SIR ARTHUR MITCHELL, K.C.B., M.D., &c.

Reprinted from The Scotsman, 19th and 23rd January 1877.

FIRST ARTICLE.

A Society has recently been formed in London, the object of which is "the promotion of legislation for the cure and control of habitual drunkards." Lord Shaftesbury is its president. Among its vice-presidents there are two Archbishops and eight Bishops. The roll of associates is long and strong, and the effort to obtain what the Society is formed to promote will not be weak. It is, therefore, of importance that the objects of the Society should be discussed, while there is yet time to bring the weight of public opinion to bear on them.

The Society has been called into existence in order to follow up the action initiated by the British Medical Association, at their meeting in Edinburgh in 1875. We learn this from the prospectus of the Society, a document which gives, as the foundation of this fresh movement on behalf of "habitual drunkards," the resolution which was passed at the meeting in question, and which may be regarded as endorsed by upwards of 7000 medical men. The resolution is carefully and cautiously framed; and there are clear indications about it of a wish to restrict, by defining, the class of drunkards for whom special legislation is desired. It sets out with a declaration that in many cases excessive intemperance is a symptom of a special form of insanity, and it has no concern with any intemperate persons except those whose intemperance is believed to be a symptom of this special form of insanity. Only to those drunkards of whom this can be truly said has the resolution any applicability. If no such persons exist, then the rest of the resolution, having nothing to support it, falls and vanishes. Assuming the actual existence of such persons, the resolution goes on to declare (1) that the special form of insanity under which they labour, requires a special treatment, which, in the present state of the law, is not attainable; and (2) that its attainment is desirable in the interests both of society and of the subjects of this special insanity. Lest there should be doubts as to the correctness of my interpretation, I give the resolution at length. It runs as follows:—

"That excessive intemperance is, in many cases, a symptom of a special form of insanity, which requires special treatment, with a view first to the recovery of those affected, and second to the protection and advantage of them and society; that in the present state of the law such treatment is not attainable; and that it is desirable that legal provision should be made to render it attainable."

This expression of opinion led to co-operation between the British Medical and the Social Science Associations, and ended in the framing of a petition to Parliament, which the new society adopts. In that petition, however, little trace of the resolution can be detected. It wants precision. It proceeds on no well defined line. It is sensational in its philanthropy. It exhibits a stupendous credulity, and in various other respects has objectionable features which are calculated to defeat its object.

It would be inconvenient to make a document like the petition referred to the basis of a discussion of the important questions raised by a proposal to legislate for the control and cure of habitual drunkards. But an excellent text is afforded by the resolution adopted by the British Medical Association, which suggests such questions as the following:—What are the relations of drunkenness to insanity? Are they simple and single, or complicated and many? How far are they met by the existing lunacy laws? Is it a fact that there is a special form of insanity, of which excessive intemperance is a symptom? If so, what is that form, and why does it require special treatment? Do the lunacy laws not reach all forms of insanity, and is special legislation for this special form really needed? If so, what should be its nature? Can it be asked on the ground that by special treatment this special form of mental disease can be cured? Is there any good reason for believing that this result is ever attained; Or, is it really for the comfort, convenience, and advantage of society that fresh and special legislation is desired? If this is so, why is it not frankly stated? Why do people affect to be anxious about the reformation of this kind of drunkard, if their deeper and truer wish is simply to obtain the means of shutting him up and of freeing themselves, in that way, of the annoyance, injury, and distress which he causes? These and many other similar questions are naturally suggested by the resolution, and it is my intention in what follows to attempt to furnish the answer. Perhaps I shall most easily and most fully do so if I show in what various ways drunkenness stands related to insanity, and in what manner the existing lunacy laws affect drunkenness under its different phases and circumstances.

First, then, it should at once be understood that alcoholic intoxication—that is, ordinary drunkenness—is really a state of insanity. The person labouring under it can legally and scientifically be certified to be a lunatic. He cannot, however, be sent to an asylum, because the certificates, on which the Sheriff grants his order, must not only bear that he is a lunatic, but must also declare that he is a fit and proper subject for care and treatment in an asylum. This last cannot be certified, because it is known that he labours under a kind of insanity which will speedily pass off. It is nothing but the known transitoriness of his condition which prevents his being sent to an asylum. If it were believed that his condition would endure, he might and would be sent. It is known, however, that he has been drinking, and experience tells that the disordered action of his brain will soon disappear—he will probably fall asleep, and after a few hours awaken in a state of sobriety and sanity, and therefore he cannot be declared to be a fit and proper subject for care and treatment in an asylum. He is, nevertheless, while his intoxication lasts, a lunatic. It is true that the law does not confer on him all the immunities and disabilities which are generally understood to be conferred broadly and equally on all insane persons; but with reference to this it has to be pointed out, first, that some of them are conferred on him, and secondly, that the general understanding is a mistaken one, for immunities and disabilities are not broadly and equally conferred on all persons who can be declared to be insane there being, in point of fact, and not unwisely, a considerable uncertainty in the whole matter. Laws are not made to fit into scientific definitions—their framers have in view the convenience and the wishes of society; and, in administering them, these considerations rightly come to the front, and practically lead to results which are for the general advantage, though scientists may speak of them as discordant, or even as unjust.

So much for one of the relations which exist between an ordinary fit of intoxication and insanity. But there are others which are less direct. Thus, a man who is often drunk, passes through frequent short attacks of insanity, and runs the risk of permanently injuring his brain. Many persons do, as a matter of fact, travel to asylums by this road, and thus we have another, and less immediate, but very important relation of drunkenness to insanity. It is not an uncommon thing, however, that such persons show an hereditary predisposition to insanity, and occasionally this, and not the drinking, is made to account for their insanity. There is little truth and much error in such a view. No doubt the mental instability which is involved in the hereditary predisposition is not a silent factor, but in the vast majority of cases it is the drunkenness which makes it speak. In a well-ordered life it might have remained silent, as indeed in such lives it frequently does; for, after all, only a small percentage of those disposed to insanity by heredity do actually become insane. It would be a sad thing for society if it were otherwise, so numerous is the army of those who are thus predisposed. It is a fortunate feature of man's constitution that his brain is thrown into disorder with much difficulty; and so it happens that a drunkard's life is quite as likely to lead to disease of some other organ, as it is to disease of the brain—to disease, for instance, of the liver, or lungs, or kidneys, according to the constitutional proclivity of the individual. It is quite certain, indeed, that drinking makes wrecks of a far larger number of people by inducing diseases of these organs than it does by causing cerebral disorders.

Those whose attention is much given to probing questions of this kind are constantly falling on illustrations of what we all understand when we speak of the working of wheels within wheels. For instance, it is said, and truly said, that the children of drunkards are in a larger proportion idiotic, imbecile, epileptic, &c., than are the children of the sober, and also that a larger proportion of them become drunkards or lunatics when they reach adult life. And here we have still another indirect relation of drunkenness to insanity, but in considering it we must not forget that the drunkard very frequently is a man who transmits to his children, not simply drinking habits, but also a tendency to insanity which he has inherited, and which has found its expression in his case in a weak character and habitual drunkenness. In all that relates to health and disease there is a wonderful interlacing of causes—perhaps even of causes and effects. Where there are so many contributors, it is scarcely correct to speak of any one as the author. But it is not to be doubted that excessive drinking stands as a most important contributor to the whole chapter of human misfortunes, and that it leads to a large amount of insanity, and of insanity's kinsfolk—crime, indolence and poverty.

In all that has been said I have been speaking of ordinary drunkards—working-men who seek the tavern and get drunk there on pay-nights, and on other nights also when they have money at command, or when their friends treat them; gentlemen who get drunk at balls, dinners, pic-nics, and race meetings; persons who drink to excess in company and in convivial surroundings, not alone and secretly; persons who get occasionally, or often, or even very often drunk, but who do so, more or less truly, in public; persons who yield the drunk and disorderly, and the drunk and incapable of the Police Courts, and many of the assaulters, stabbers, wife-beaters, and man-slaughters of the higher Courts. These I call ordinary drunkards. They are regarded as vicious. It is held that they could avoid doing what they do—that they could abstain if they chose. It is not proposed to treat them as labouring under any form of mental disease. No one has recommended that we should build institutions for the cure and control of this multitude. They are held to be proper subjects for punishment. It may be held that the punishment should be weightier than it usually is, and that it should be of a nature which would tend more to make the thing punished disgraceful, but even those who recommend this generally stipulate that it shall not involve additional taxation.

These ordinary drunkards are related to lunatics, but in no such way as to need new or special legislation. All of them may be regarded as often, though temporarily, on the roll of lunatics. In addition to this they contribute heavily to the number of the insane in asylums; but they do this last only as the unhealthy and the vicious of all sorts do, and scarcely in any more special sense or greater degree. When they become fit subjects for asylums, then they are received into those institutions without regard to the vicious origin of their malady, just as are all other lunatics—and they are many—who owe their insanity to courses as vicious and as much under control as those which are followed by drunkards.

To the persons of whom I have been writing, the resolution which forms the text of this discussion has no reference, since they cannot be said to be persons who labour under a special form of insanity, which has excessive intemperance as one of its symptoms.

We turn now to another relation which exists between drunkenness and insanity. Habitual drunkards not unfrequently fall into a condition known as delirium tremens. It is not necessary that the drinking which precedes this state should go often to the extent of deep intoxication. It appears rather to crown the everlasting muddlement of the dram-drinker and the tippler. But nearly all the victims of it may be correctly enough described as habitual drunkards.

All those who labour under delirium tremens are beyond question in a state of lunacy. It is indeed a well-defined form of insanity, having both mental and bodily characters which are very distinctive. The subjects of it can be legally certified to be insane, and they could be further certified to be fit and proper objects for care and treatment in asylums, were it not that in their case, as in the case of the drunkards of whom I have already spoken, it is known that their condition will not probably endure long, and that when it passes away it will leave them in their normal or usual mental state. An attack of delirium tremens lasts longer than a fit of intoxication—days taking the place of hours—but still it is practically felt that both are short-lived and transitory. So it happens that few persons labouring under delirium tremens are actually sent to asylums; but some are—those, for instance, who prove difficult to manage, who are thought dangerous to themselves or others, or who are long of showing signs of improvement. In other words, whenever, in any particular case of delirium tremens, the condition has features which indicate that the appliances of an asylum would be useful and desirable in its treatment, then there is no difficulty in granting the necessary certificates and obtaining the necessary order. The present laws, therefore, reach this form of insanity, and do for it all that is necessary, either for those who labour under it, or for society. It is true that they make no provision for the control of the patient after he recovers. They do not prevent him from going back to his old habits, and having as the result a second attack. They treat him, however, in this respect just as they treat other lunatics, whose disease is as distinctly due to a vicious disregard of the laws of health, and who are as likely to resume evil courses, and have second and third attacks of insanity.

In delirium tremens we have thus another and somewhat closer and more special relation between drunkenness and insanity; but those labouring under it are clearly not the persons pointed at in the resolution of the British Medical Association, since it cannot be said of them that excessive drinking is a symptom of their insanity, nor that their insanity requires a special and unattainable mode of treatment.

There is still another state of insanity which stands in a direct and immediate relationship with drunkenness. We refer to what is known as mania à potu. This state, as a rule, immediately follows a fit of intoxication. In some senses, perhaps, it is a continuation of it. When, in ordinary cases, sobriety should appear, in these cases it is found that it does not appear, a state of excitement and of disordered mental action remaining. The patients are often violent and difficult to manage, but the great majority of them soon recover. It is almost unnecessary to say that they can be certified to be lunatics. Indeed, such certificates regarding them are being constantly granted—more, too, than mere certificates of lunacy, for they are also often certified to be proper subjects for asylum treatment. Nevertheless, there is practically an unwillingness to send them to asylums, because their condition is regarded as more or less transitory, and for no other reason. If their condition were thought to be one likely to endure long, no persons would be regarded as more clearly needing the appliances of an asylum for their proper treatment and safe custody. When their condition, however, is clearly recognised as due to a fit of excessive drinking, then they are generally kept at home for a time, in the hope that the excitement will pass away. The amount of waiting will, of course, vary. Its length will depend somewhat on the patient's condition and circumstances; but it may depend also on the nearness of an asylum, and, in the case of a poor person, on the degree of control over the patient's discharge which the Parochial Board may possess.

Every person who has an attack of this form of mental disorder cannot be said to be an habitual drunkard, since it may present itself as the outcome of a single fit of intoxication. But generally those who labour under it have been frequently drunk, and in their cases it will often be found that intoxication has been characterised by an unusual degree of excitement.

The provisions of the existing laws reach them. There is nothing special about their mental disorder except its cause and progress. In its manifestations it does not differ from insanity caused by many other things. Indeed, if the history of the attack is not known, it may be impossible to name it—to assert, for instance, that it is not due to such a thing as a blow on the head, and that it is due to alcoholic intoxication. Its relation to drunkenness is as immediate and intimate as it can be, but it is still not the condition referred to in the resolution of the British Medical Association, since excessive intemperance is clearly not a symptom of it, and since it requires no special and unattainable treatment.

We have still, therefore, to look for some other condition which has relations both to drunkenness and insanity, which is special in its form, and which requires a special treatment not attainable under existing laws.

SECOND ARTICLE.

In the first article it was shown that the resolution of the British Medical Association did not refer either to ordinary drunkards, or to persons labouring under delirium tremens or mania à potu. There can be little doubt that the condition which is known as dipsomania is the one which the Association had in view, as meeting the requirements of their definition. The name is not a good one, and efforts have been made to invent a better, but without success. The name, however, will matter little if we succeed in disclosing what the condition is believed to be.

It is said that persons who are in the condition known as dipsomania exhibit an uncontrollable craving for intoxicants, which is not constant, but recurs at irregular intervals, and which is preferentially gratified in secret, the gratification having no reference to anything external, either of the nature of conviviality or of any other nature. The craving is thought to be beyond control, and this is held as placing the condition in a near relation to insanity. That relation, however, is said to be strengthened by the alleged fact that those who become the victims of this craving undergo a marked change of character, and also a certain deterioration of mental power. The change of character is said to be uniform, and to be seen in a peculiar inability to be quite truthful, in a blunting of the affections, and in a loss of the sense of duty and self-respect. It is asserted by those familiar with the condition that the kind of moral degradation which attends it is characteristic and easily recognised. The deterioration of intellectual power is said to be chiefly manifested in weakness of will or purpose, in loss of memory, in childish repetitions of the same story, in an enfeebled ability to reason soundly, and in an unwillingness to engage in any serious mental work. It is not held that this impairment of intellectual power is necessarily great. On the contrary, it is admitted that in some cases it may be so slight as to be difficult of detection. The moral deterioration, however, is held to be constant, and to be always tolerably well marked; but it is admitted that a moral deterioration of exactly the same character may occur in persons who are not the victims of this craving. Nor is the moral change thought to be of such a nature as to lead in any special degree to crimes against the person or against property. It is not said to injure general society so much as it does that branch of general society formed by the family—parents, brothers, sisters, husbands, wives, and children.

It is clear that certificates of lunacy cannot easily be obtained in the case of a person who is in the condition now described. If he is found actually drunk, then, of course, certificates may be granted, but whenever he becomes sober, they would cease to be true, and action on them could not continue to be taken. It is held, however, that his lunacy is really not confined to the periods of intoxication. On the contrary, he is held to be insane at his soberest moments, and the recurring fits of drunkenness are looked on merely as a symptom of that insanity. If such a person exists, then, in his case, we have clearly reached a special form of insanity, having excessive intemperance as one of its symptoms, and lying beyond the scope of existing lunacy laws.

The first difficulty with most people will be to bring themselves to believe that excessive intemperance should not be described rather as a cause than as a symptom of this condition. This feeling derives support from the fact that it is nowhere asserted that the change in the moral and intellectual nature necessarily precedes the intemperance. The stories about dipsomania immediately following such things as blows on the head, sun-stroke, and loss of blood, may be true, but they are received as doubtful by many, and are entirely disbelieved by some. Indeed, it is admitted that such cases can at best be only regarded as exceptional, and that in nearly every instance a course of intemperance does actually precede the change of character, and precedes also that condition which is ultimately regarded as a drink-craving beyond control. At this early stage it is felt that drunkenness is acting as a cause, and not appearing as an effect. This, however, may be true, and yet it may eventually appear as an effect. In other words, a controllable intemperance may induce a state which leads to an uncontrollable intemperance. This at least is possible. We are able to say so from the analogies which are furnished by other states of disease. It is at least possible, therefore, that the condition I am writing about may have this history, and it must be remembered that I am dealing now with a feature of the condition which scarcely admits of absolute proof. Perhaps the best evidence of its truth that we possess is the fact that 7000 medical men have resolved that it is true. The value of this evidence, however, depends on the confidence we place in the observing and reasoning powers of these gentlemen, and in the security we have that the expression of opinion by the association as a body was not in reality an expression of opinion by an enthusiastic handful—the great bulk of the members being ignorant of and indifferent about the whole matter. Let this stand as it may, we know it to be often and confidently asserted that medical men of experience have little difficulty in agreeing, with regard to any patient actually before them, that he does or does not labour under this insane craving for drink—in other words, that he is or is not something more than, and different from, an ordinary drunkard. They profess to be able to say of certain persons with confidence that they labour under a disease, which they may possibly have acquired through intemperance, but of which the existing intemperance has become an effect or symptom; and it is even asserted that the chances of disagreement among experienced medical men would be less in regard to a case of dipsomania than in regard to many other diseases. If it be true, then, that the condition can be so surely and readily recognised, it may fairly be held that we have in that fact a strong argument for its existence. It cannot, however, be otherwise regarded than as a very awkward circumstance, that the promoters of legislation for a special class of persons, may, on the threshold, be asked to prove that any such class exists. From an examination of all that has been said on the subject, I think that they would be able to show that they have sufficient grounds for the faith that is in them, and in all that follows I shall assume that they have done this—admitting at the same time the reasonableness of doubts, and conceding that the alleged destruction of control is not total, but only such as presents itself in the so-called uncontrollable conduct of many who labour under the ordinary forms of lunacy.

Taking for granted, then, that there are persons with this uncontrollable craving for intoxicants—persons who, in the words of the resolution, labour under a special form of insanity, which has excessive intemperance for a symptom—do they require any special treatment? What is that treatment? And is it not attainable under the laws as they stand?

In answering these questions, it is necessary on the threshold to point out that such persons cannot be received into ordinary asylums as lunatics, for the very good reason that they cannot be certified to be lunatics. Their insanity is not held to be of the ordinary, but to be of a special form, and to be beyond the scope of the existing lunacy laws. It is true they may enter asylums as voluntary patients, but this would not confer any power of detaining them, and the craving, when it arose, being beyond control, would drive them out. It is stated, indeed, that not many of those who enter asylums voluntarily remain in them longer than a few weeks. In no way, therefore, is their treatment in asylums possible, even if it were thought that the organisation of asylums, and the kind of life which is led in them, supplied a treatment suitable to such cases. The reverse of this, however, is the opinion held. It is said that the dipsomania requires a treatment of a special character. In what this special character would consist I scarcely know, and opinions might differ on the subject; but there can be no doubt of this, that its essential feature would be prolonged and compulsory detention, with enforced abstinence from intoxicants. Whatever he might gain, the insane drink-craver would certainly lose his personal liberty, and be forced to submit to a discipline which would in all probability be irksome. In other words, a person labouring under a disease, which is not lunacy, though said to be in alliance with lunacy, which is described as a special form of lunacy, would be liable to a prolonged incarceration. It is alleged, of course, that this would be done for his good, that his recovery would be the chief object; but, though still legally a sane man, he would not be consulted as to whether he wished or did not wish to be cured, nor could he interrupt a treatment which, after trial, he might greatly dislike. But more than this is alleged—it is also alleged, though less prominently, that the seclusion of such persons is desirable in the interests of society—that the convenience and comfort of society are consulted in the matter—and that it is intended to save families from ruin and misery. These are excellent objects, and it would certainly not be dishonest to bring them in a clearer way to the front. Perhaps it would even be more honest. They are not motives to be ashamed of. They are, indeed, exactly those which lead to the seclusion in asylums of a large number of ordinary lunatics, and it is certain that their attainment may be much more confidently reckoned on than the recovery of the secluded. Indeed, there is little evidence that prolonged detention and abstinence would result in many cures of dipsomania. This is a damaging fact, but it must be remembered that as yet we have possessed no means of acquiring evidence, and that we cannot acquire it without the assistance of legislation. We have, indeed, little to go on, but the reports which come to us from America. These are generally regarded as too good to be true, and it does not appear that practical men in this country place much confidence in them. In short, we cannot, as yet, tell whether the insane drink-craver can be cured by any sort of treatment, and there are certainly more things to make us despair than there are to make us hope. On the other hand, it is beyond doubt that the comfort and well-being of many families would be greatly promoted by an enforced withdrawal of some member who is unfortunately in the condition of those persons in regard to whom this resolution desires legislation. Whatever prolonged incarceration might do for the drink-craver himself, it would often confer a blessing on the family to which he belongs, and it does not seem unfair that the law should be made to protect the healthy and well-doing against the diseased and ill-doing. We use the double words here to meet any theory which may be adopted regarding the condition of the so-called dipsomania. With no theory, however, except that which involves the idea of disease, do we see how Parliament can ever be successfully approached; and in making a demand for fresh and special legislation, it must be shown that we have only recently recognised the special form of disease under which some drunkards labour, and the necessity for a mode of treating it which cannot be pursued without legal authority. We must define and specify the class of habitual drunkards for whose care and control we desire to legislate. We can scarcely ask that the law should set in motion a scheme for curing and controlling every one who could be called an habitual drunkard, because the term is loose, and includes a multitude of persons who could not all be treated in one way. The dealing of the law with drunkards generally can only be in the way of punishment, or of regulating the sale of drink. The resolution of the 7000 doctors does not touch that aspect of the great drink question. It confines itself to asking legislation for a certain specified class of drunkards, and it starts wisely by declaring that an alliance exists between the condition of that class and the condition of the insane, in regard to whom the law already and largely concerns itself. It thus appears to be only asking an extension of existing legislation. Even this will not be easily obtained. The difficulties and obstacles are great and numerous. It is not easy, indeed, to see by what machinery the views embodied in the resolution could be safely worked out. Among the hindrances will certainly be the vague, ill-defined, and unpractical views which direct the action and inspire the sensational missives of the Friendly Society to which I have alluded. There is a fact, too, relating to insane drink-cravers themselves, which may prove both a help and a hindrance. It is this:—The majority of them in my opinion belong to the better class of society—to the educated class, that is, from the superior artisan upwards—who live in comfort, and sometimes in affluence, and their whole number, great as it is, is not so great as is often supposed. I am referring, of course, exclusively to those persons of whom it could be certified that they labour under a special form of insanity, which has excessive intemperance as one of its symptoms. If I am right in this opinion, it follows that not a few of these persons could defray the cost of a legalised detention out of their own pockets, and no aid from the Consolidated Fund, or from Rates of any kind, would be needed either to establish or to maintain the institutions in which their detention would take place. Such institutions would be the outcome of philanthropy or private adventure under State supervision and control, and Parliament might be asked to do nothing more than sanction the compulsory detention in institutions licensed and supervised by the State, of persons found after legal inquest of some prescribed kind to be in the condition which the resolution defines. Such legislation would, in a full sense, be permissive. It would permit those to have the advantage of its provisions who could themselves meet the cost, or who could do so through help from charitable and public organisations. If cases were found to follow prolonged enforced abstinence, then an effort might be made to extend and widen the law.

APPENDIX M.

* PARLIAMENTARY HISTORY OF THE QUESTION OF THE TREATMENT OF INEBRIATES.

In 1870 Dr Dalrymple moved a resolution on the subject of Habitual Drunkards (Hansard, Vol. cxcix., 1,241), and subsequently introduced a Bill (No. 197 of Session 1870). This Bill provided for both criminal and non-criminal habitual drunkards. For the latter, reformatories under the control of the Lunacy Commissioners (clauses 4 and 8) were to be established by individuals, by corporations, or by magistrates assembled in quarter sessions (clause 3), to which habitual drunkards might be admitted at the request of a near relation, friend or guardian, upon the production of two medical certificates, and upon the affidavit of some credible witness other than the applicant (clause 6). The limits of detention were to be 3 and 12 months, though there was given a power to discharge the persons confined (clause 9), and to shorten or extend the period of detention (clause 11). For criminal drunkards it was provided that magistrates or boards of guardians might establish reformatories, either as separate institutions or as wings of a prison or workhouse (clauses 12 and 13), to which habitual drunkards might be committed on a third conviction for drunkenness within a period of six months (clause 15). To this class of reformatories might also be committed habitual drunkards who were unable to pay for their maintenance in any other (clause 14). The limits of detention were to be 3 and 12 months (clause 15), though there was power to extend the period of committal by six months (clause 16).

The Bill did not reach second reading. In 1871 Dr Dalrymple re-introduced the Bill (No. 38 of Session 1871), but withdrew the motion for second reading on the suggestion of the then Home Secretary (Mr Bruce), that a Select Committee should be appointed the following Session to consider the subject (Hansard, Vol. ccvii., 1,501).

The Select Committee, consisting of Sir H. Johnstone, Mr Birley, Mr H. Samuelson, Mr Wharton, Dr Playfair, Mr Akroyd, Mr Mitchell Henry, Lord Claud Hamilton, Mr Miller, Mr Downing, Major Walker, Mr Winterbotham, Mr Read, Colonel Brise, and Dr Dalrymple (chairman) was appointed early in 1872, and reported in June of that year (Parliamentary Paper 242 of Session 1872). In the following July Dr Dalrymple introduced an elaborate Bill to carry out the Committee's recommendations (No. 279 of Session 1872).

The Bill proposed to provide two classes of retreats: (1) Houses licensed by the justices into which an habitual drunkard might be received (clause 8) on his own request, or on that of the guardian of his person, appointed by the Court of Chancery (clause 71). (2) Certified industrial hospitals (clause 39), to the support of which boards of guardians and prison authorities might contribute (clauses 42 and 43), and to which an habitual drunkard (see clause 7 for definition) might be committed by a court of summary jurisdiction on conviction of drunkenness (clause 56). There was a power given for the temporary removal of a person from a licensed house (clause 28), and for release on license from a hospital (clause 67). Mention may also be made of the extensive powers of retaking escaped patients which clause 69 proposed to give. The clause ran as follows:—

"If a patient escape from a hospital he may, at any time before the expiration of his prescribed period of detention, be retaken without warrant, and be detained, as if he had not escaped."

The central authority under the Bill was to be the Home Secretary.

The Bill did not proceed beyond first reading in 1872, and when re-introduced in 1873 (Bill No. 11 of Session 1873), the House was counted out on the second reading.

Dr Dalrymple died in the autumn of 1873, and no further proposals for legislation on the subject of inebriates came before Parliament until 1877. In that year the Archbishop of Canterbury moved in the House of Lords for the appointment of a Select Committee on Intemperance. The Committee finally reported in July (H. L. paper (28) of Session 1878-9), and though habitual drunkenness was not directly dealt with, the evidence taken by the Committee has an important bearing on the subject; while the report itself contains a valuable criticism of the statistics then available of apprehensions and convictions for drunkenness.

During the same Session, in the House of Commons, Sir Charles Cameron introduced an Habitual Drunkards Bill (No. 105 of Session 1877), an important development of the Bills of 1872 and 1873. Provision was made for the establishment of two classes of institutions, (a) retreats to be licensed by the local authority, the justices in quarter sessions (clause 6), and (b) inebriate reformatories to be provided directly by the local authority (clause 17). To retreats persons might be admitted on their own application (clause 10) or on committal by the justices in petty sessions, sitting either with or without a jury to hear a summons granted on the application of the parent, husband, wife, relative, or guardian of an habitual drunkard (clauses 11, 12, 13). To reformatories were to be sent (1) habitual drunkards convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction (clause 29), or (2) persons who, having been convicted of drunkenness three times within three months, were unable to find sureties for their good behaviour for twelve months (clause 30). A power of discharge was given (clause 15), and also of leave of absence on license (clause 53). On escape an habitual drunkard might be retaken at any time before the expiration of his prescribed period of detention "by any officer, attendant, servant, or other person employed in or about such retreat or inebriate reformatory, or by any peace officer, without warrant, and be detained as if he had not escaped" (clause 75).

A habitual drunkard is defined as a person who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or herself or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself, and his or her affairs.

A retreat is defined as a house licensed by the licensing authority named by this Act, for the reception, control, care, and curative treatment of habitual drunkards.

Retreats were to be in the main private speculations, power being given to enforce payment by the habitual drunkard himself (clause 63), or by his relatives (clause 64), or, in the case of a pauper, by the union or parish from which he was sent. No license was to be given to any person who was licensed to keep a house for the reception of lunatics. Reformatories were to be provided out of local rates (clause 23), with contributions from the Treasury (clause 57), and payments by habitual drunkards, their relatives, or unions, as in the case of retreats.

In the application of this Act to Scotland the following provisions shall have effect:—

- (1) The term "sheriff" includes sheriff-substitute.
- (2) All penalties for offences under this Act shall be recovered, with expenses, in a summary manner before the sheriff at the instance of the procurator-fiscal of court.
- (3) An appeal against a conviction or order of a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act shall be to the Court of Justiciary at the next circuit court, or, where there are no circuit courts, to the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, and not otherwise; and such appeal may be made in the manner and under the rules, limitations, and conditions contained in the Act of the twentieth year of the reign of King George the Second, chapter forty-three, "for taking away and abolishing heritable jurisdictions in Scotland," or as near thereto as circumstances admit; with this variation, that the appellant shall find caution to pay the fine and expenses awarded against him by the conviction or order appealed from, together with any additional expenses awarded by the court dismissing the appeal.
- (4) The jurisdiction and authority conferred on a county court judge under this Act in England, may in Scotland be exercised by a sheriff.

The Bill did not reach a second reading in 1877, and was re-introduced in 1878 (Bill No. 27 of Session 1878). In moving the second reading on the 3rd July (Hansard, Vol. ccxli, 688), Sir Charles Cameron announced his readiness to abandon the compulsory clauses in committee, and after a long debate the Bill was read a second time without a division. The Bill was then considered in committee, and reported as amended (Bill No. 250 of Session 1878). The effect of the Bill as amended was that it made provision for the establishment of retreats (as described above) alone, to which persons should only be admitted on their own application (clause 9).

In 1879 Sir Charles Cameron re-introduced the Bill as amended in 1878 (Bill No. 47 of Session 1879). The Bill, with important modifications, especially in limiting the power of retaking escaped patients, passed through the Commons (Hansard, Vol. ccxliii, 1384).

In the House of Lords the Bill was taken charge of by Lord Shaftesbury, and there was an important debate on the second reading, in the course of which Lord Selborne expressed the opinion that perhaps over-caution was the fault of the measure (Hansard, Vol. ccxlv., 1945).

The Bill, the duration of which was limited to 10 years, received the Royal assent in July as the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879.

In 1887 Sir Charles Cameron introduced a Bill (No. 229 of Session 1887), to give permanency to the Act of 1879 (clause 2), to enable a licensee to appoint a deputy (clause 3), and also to provide that the attestation of an application for admission to a retreat might be by any justice of the peace instead of two justices. The Bill made no progress that Session.

In 1888 it was re-introduced by Sir Charles Cameron in two forms, one (Bill No. 141 of Session 1888) identical with the Bill of 1887, and the other (Bill No. 203 of Session 1888), changing the name to the Inebriates Act (clause 1), making permanent the Act of 1879 (clause 2), enabling a licensee to appoint a deputy to act for six weeks only in the year (clause 3), and providing that the attestation of an application for admission might be by any two justices instead of by two justices having summary jurisdiction in the place where the matter requiring the cognizance of a justice arises (clause 4 taken in connection with sections 3 and 10 of the Act of 1879). The latter Bill passed the House of Commons, and on its introduction in the House of Lords by the Earl of Aberdeen, was after a short debate agreed to (Hansard, Vol. cccxxvii., 1,513). It received the Royal assent in July 1888.

From 1890 to 1891 several meetings of a representative Committee, composed of 19 delegates, 10 from England, 8 from Scotland, and 1 from Ireland, were held in London, under the auspices of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, London, and of the Central Committee of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies of Great Britain and Ireland. It was ultimately resolved in May 1891, that the Memorial and Statistics prepared by Dr J. F. Sutherland, should be presented to the House of Lords, and that Sir James M. Carmichael, Bart., M.P., Mr A. J. Maddison, and Dr Sutherland, wait upon Lord Herschell with the object of enlisting his sympathy, and if satisfied after the interview and consideration of the Memorial, getting his Lordship to present the petition, and move for an inquiry. Lord Herschell did so, and as the result of his action a Departmental Committee for England was appointed by the Home Secretary, Mr Matthews.

When it was ascertained that Scotland was not to be embraced in the inquiry, the Glasgow Committee on Habitual Drunkards and Offenders appointed a deputation, consisting of Mr Provand, M.P., Bailies Chisholm and Macfarlane, the Rev. Hugh Ross, M.A., and Dr J. F. Sutherland, to wait upon Sir George O. Trevelyan, Bart., M.P., Secretary for Scotland, and to present a Memorial (vide Appendix H). This was done in Glasgow, in November 1892, and strong reasons given by the different speakers, setting forth the necessity for something being done without delay. Subsequently (1893) the Edinburgh Association for the Reclamation of Habitual Offenders, the joint Committees of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Aberdeen, and Greenock took action, and forwarded Memorials to the Secretary for Scotland, pressing for an inquiry (vide Appendix F). Accordingly, in May 1894, Sir George O. Trevelyan appointed a Departmental Committee, which has now reported.

NOTES UPON THE PRESENT LAW.

BY PROFESSOR DOVE WILSON.

At the request of the Committee, I have prepared the following notes upon the present state of the Law affecting the questions into which they have to inquire.

I.—HABITUAL OFFENDERS.

The term 'habitual offenders' is not known to the law of Scotland. The nearest approach or analogy to it is that, as an aggravation of theft, it may be set forth that a person is 'habit and repute' a thief. In order to make out this aggravation it is necessary to prove that the person shall have got, or supplemented, his livelihood by theft for at least a year prior to the theft of which he is accused. The proof invariably consists of the evidence of officers of police, usually belonging to the detective force. The aggravation may be established, although the person has not been previously convicted. Its effect, when proved, bears upon the sentence alone.

The Prevention of Crimes Acts of 1871 and 1879, although intended to deal with 'habitual criminals,' avoid the use of the expression.

The term 'habitual offenders' is a popular one, intended to denote persons who have been repeatedly convicted of petty common law offences or of police offences, and who, for some cause, have proved not to be capable of being deterred by ordinary punishments. To make a legal definition of the term, it would be necessary (1) to fix the number of convictions or imprisonments which should be taken as prima facie evidence of the acquisition of the habit of offending; (2) to specify the offences convictions for which should be taken into consideration; and (3) to make it relevant to inquire into all the other circumstances of the offender's life which could show whether or not it was desirable to deal with him in a special manner.

PROVING PREVIOUS CONVICTIONS.

Previous conviction of any common-law crime or offence, and of any statutory crime which is of the same character as that for which the accused is being tried, may, under Lord Kingsburgh's Act, be proved as an aggravation of the punishment.

In jury cases the proof is tendered after the jury have given their verdict of guilty of the crime charged.

In trials without jury a similar course ought to be followed under the Act, and is easily done if the clerk of court reads from the complaint, to the magistrate who is trying the cause, at first only the main charge, and refrains from reading to him the portion relating to previous convictions till that charge is disposed of.

There is considerable doubt whether previous convictions for statutory police offences can be charged at all without special statutory authority. This has been given only in a very few cases, such as the Salmon Poaching Acts; and in the great mass of police offences there was till the Burgh Police Act of 1892 no provision for previous convictions being taken into account. Whatever may be the theory of the common law upon the point, the practice has always been that each police offence stands by itself, and that the discretion of the magistrate, in awarding punishment within the permitted limits, is presumed to be exercised according to the lightness or badness of the particular charge before him, and not according to whether the offence has been repeated. As matter of fact it is undoubted that previous police offences have never been labelled and proved as aggravations without special statutory authority, but as magistrates do not understand the theory upon which this practice rests, which is possibly somewhat of a refinement, and as they naturally place reliance on repetition as an element aggravating the punishment, they have recourse to their own recollections, to information asked from the accused, or to information obtained from the police, on what seems to them a relevant point. The view that previous convictions of police offences cannot be charged as aggravations has nothing to do with those few cases in which, intent being in issue, previous convictions may relevantly be proved in support of the substantive charge.

This state of the law and practice seems attended with very obvious disadvantages. It makes the sentence depend on accidents, and sometimes must deprive the accused of the power of meeting the impression of repetition. It would be much better, under proper precautions against their being brought to the magistrates' notice till the main charge is disposed of, to allow previous convictions in all cases to be regularly adduced as an aggravation of punishment. The course here recommended is adopted in the Burgh Police Act of 1892 (§ 465) with reference to police offences prosecuted under it, but the power should be made general, that Act having only a very limited application.

ACCEPTING BAIL.

The practice of the police when they have apprehended any person for a petty offence, whether common law or statutory, and have brought him to a police station, accepting from him a sum of money in name of bail, in place of detaining him in the lock-up, is very common in Scotland and very useful. It is regulated for counties, under the County Police Act of 1857 (sect. 13). For burghs in general it was regulated by the Lindsay Act of 1862 (sect. 417); and is now regulated under the Burgh Police Act of 1892 (sect. 471). Similar powers for the larger burghs are contained in their special Police Acts.

Under this power, the Chief Constable, or in his absence the officer who is in charge of the station, accepts from the accused a sum or article in name of bail. The amount or value is matter of discretion, but it is usually fixed with reference to the fine which it is supposed the accused has incurred. The maximum in counties is £10, and in burghs £20. Naturally the standard varies very much. In some burghs, for example, the average is twice as high as in others. When the amount has been received by the officer it is entered in a book, and the accused gets a receipt specifying the day and hour when he has to appear in court to answer to the charge.

At the time of appearance, if the accused appears, his bail is returned to him, and the trial proceeds in the ordinary way. If, as is usually the case, he fails to appear, the bail is forfeited, and at this point the practice again varies. It is competent now to grant a warrant to apprehend or to cite, and in a few courts this is invariably done, the magistrates considering that all charges ought to be disposed of publicly. In the great majority of courts, nothing in all but exceptionally bad cases, follows the forfeiture.

The forfeiture of bail does not count in law as a previous conviction. No means exist for identifying, at future dates, the persons who have forfeited, and, as matter of fact, it is well known that the names and addresses given are often fictitious.

NOTE ON FOREIGN LAWS.

I am informed that in the laws of most foreign countries the expression 'habitual offenders' is equally unknown.

In Germany, for example, it is in popular use (Gewohnheits-verbrecher), but it does not occur in the German Criminal Code, nor, as I am informed, in their other legislation. The inmates of the German labour colonies are voluntary. Even the power of proving previous convictions is, under the German Code, very limited, being applicable only to the case of theft, robbery, and similar crimes (sects. 244 and 245).

The most instructive example of foreign legislation on the subject will be found in Belgium.

Under the Belgium Law of 27th November 1891, for the repression of vagabondage and mendicity, three classes of places of correction are established, namely, depots of mendicity, houses of refuge, and schools of charity.

To the first may be committed, for periods of not less than two or more than seven years, persons who, in place of obtaining their living by labour, are professional beggars, or, in consequence of idleness, drunkenness, or evil dispositions, live in a state of vagabondage. Persons who have been tried for crimes and offences punishable with less than a year's imprisonment, may, if they fall within the above classes, be sentenced, after fulfilling the term of their ordinary punishment, to be detained in a depot of mendicity. Although habitual offenders are not specially mentioned, they evidently fall under the class dealt with.

Less aggravated cases of vagabondage or mendicity may be confined in houses of refuge, where the forcible detention must in no case exceed one year, and where the detained must be liberated earlier, so soon as his earnings from his labour amount to a sum fixed upon a scale settled by the Minister of Justice.

The 'schools of charity' are institutions similar to our reformatory and industrial schools.

In Appendix xxv., will be found a translation of the text of the Belgian Law, which has been made by Dr. J. F. Sutherland, and also notes (mainly in connection with vagrants) on the Laws of Austria-Hungary, Denmark, France, Germany, and Switzerland.

II.—VAGRANTS AND BEGGARS.

Vagrancy is not a common-law offence in Scotland. Wandering and begging without the use of threats, and without fraud, is not punishable at common law.

Masterful begging is the extorting of alms by violence, or by threats of any kind, and is an offence at common law. It is usually tried in a summary form, and the maximum penalty in that case is 60 days' imprisonment.

In the same way, begging on false pretences of any kind is punishable at common law as 'falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition,' and is awarded the same punishment as the preceding offence. But mere begging—telling a true story of want—whether accompanied by wandering or not, is unpunishable at common law.

ROGUES AND VAGABONDS.

were punishable under various old Scottish statutes—all, with one exception, in disuse. The mere fact of being 'reputed and holden' to be an Egyptian was punishable with death, and 'Sorners' (or idle, masterful beggars) could be punished by being laid in irons, losing an ear, and banishment. In case of return they could be hanged. Harbourners of vagabonds were liable to banishment.

In the fifteenth century unlicensed beggars were liable to be 'burned in the cheek' and banished. By the Act 1672, 18 houses of correction were to be established in all the larger burghs. To them were to be sent, for indefinite periods, all unlicensed beggars, whether found in shire or burgh, and the masters of the houses were to cause the inmates to work 'by weeping, or otherways.'

In all the old statutes provision was made for the licensing of deserving beggars within certain districts—a custom kept up till comparatively recently.

The only use now made of the old Scottish statutes is that, under them and the Poor Law Act of 1845, able-bodied persons who allow their wives or children to come upon the parish for support, are liable to fine or 60 days' imprisonment, with hard labour, as rogues and vagabonds.

PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT, 1871.

The only existing statutory provision which applies to all Scotland on the general subject of vagrancy is the 4th section of the English Vagrancy Act (5 Geo. iv. cap. 83), which was made applicable to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act of 1871 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 112, sect. 15).

Under the provisions of these statutes, the following persons, among others, are to be deemed rogues and vagabonds, and may be apprehended and imprisoned, with hard labour, for three months, viz.:—Any person

- [1] Pretending to tell fortunes or deceive by palmistry;
- [2] Wandering abroad and lodging in any barn or outhouse or unoccupied building, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence and not giving a good account of himself;
- [3] Wilfully exposing in a public place any obscene print, picture, or other indecent exhibition;
- [4] Going about as a gatherer or collector of alms, or endeavouring to procure charitable contributions of any kind under any false pretence;
- [5] Running away and leaving wife or children chargeable to any parish;
- [6] Playing or betting in any street or public place with any table or instrument of gaming, at any game of chance;
- [7] Having in his possession any picklock or other implement, with intent feloniously to break into any house or building, or being armed with any gun, bludgeon, or other weapon, or having upon him any instrument with intent to commit any felonious act;
- [8] Being found in or upon any house, stable, or outhouse, or any enclosed yard, garden, or area, for any unlawful purpose; and
- [9] Any suspected person or reputed thief frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street or any highway, or any place adjacent to a street or highway, with intent to commit felony.

The provisions of this statute are little used. Other provisions being in force in burghs, it is only in counties that they can be required, and in 1893 there were only 36 cases of its application in counties for all the nine petty offences which it specifies, and of these 18 were within the jurisdiction of one chief constable, who appears to have turned it to good account. Why the statute is so little used is not plain, if the evil of vagrancy be so clamant as some think it to be. Possibly there is some lack of knowledge as to its existence. Possibly its severity has tended somewhat to defeat it; and it will be noted that those vagrants and beggars who refrain from violence, threats, or fraud, and who get lodgings in dwelling-houses, do not come within its scope.

Of other statutes dealing with vagrants, applying to the whole country, there is only one—

THE PREVENTION OF TRESPASS ACT, 1865.

Under it, parties lodging in any premises, or encamping, or (in certain cases) lighting a fire on land without permission, are liable for a first offence to a fine not over 20s., or to imprisonment not over 14 days, and for a second offence to a fine not over 40s., or imprisonment not over 21 days.

This has proved a useful statute. In my own experience, I remember that I often enforced it at first. Now it seems much seldomer to be required, vagrants seeming to have come to know that they must get leave.

ACTS OF RESTRICTED LOCAL APPLICATION.

The dealing with offences by statutes which do not apply to the whole country is contrary to sound ideas of law. The awarding of punishment is eminently a matter of public law; and the leaving of persons to be fined or imprisoned under laws of local application, or even under local and personal acts, is altogether contrary to principle. The origin of the system with us is that, the legislature failing to amend the common law, certain cities were allowed to do it for themselves, and that afterwards the provisions adopted by them were embodied in a public statute capable of being adopted by all populous places.

This led to the General Police and Improvement Act of 1862 (known as the Lindsay Act, and now repealed), which contained clauses (sects. 331–334) as to vagrants. In purport they were somewhat similar to the clauses of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sects. 408–411,—only somewhat more severe. The

Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892.

SECT. 408. Every person found begging or exposing wounds or deformities, or who shall cause or permit the exposure of children of tender age to the inclemency of the weather, or causing children to sing in any street or court or common stair, or otherwise acting so as to induce, or for the purpose of inducing, the giving of alms, and every person conducting himself as a vagrant, having no fixed place of residence and no lawful means of getting his livelihood, shall be liable, for the first offence, to a fine not exceeding twenty shillings, or to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding thirty days, or to imprisonment for such period, without the option of a fine, and for the second or any subsequent offence, to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding sixty days.

SECT. 410. It shall be lawful for any constable to apprehend and bring before the magistrate any young person found begging, or sent or suffered to go out for that purpose, and also the parents of such young person, or other relations to whose control he is subject, by whom he has been so sent or suffered to go out, and also any other person by whom such young person has been so sent out; and on the complaint being established that such young person has been sent out or suffered to go out for that purpose by his parents, or either of them, or by any other relation to whose control he is subject, or has been sent out for that purpose by any other person, it shall be lawful for the magistrate to punish such parent, relation, or other person as a vagrant or disorderly person, by a fine not exceeding five pounds, or by imprisonment for a period not exceeding thirty days.

SECT. 411. It shall be lawful for any constable to apprehend and bring before the magistrate all such beggars, vagrants and idle poor persons, strolling or wandering, or seeking relief, or found lying in any outhouse, stair, close or area, or other place within the burgh; and it shall be lawful for the magistrate to direct and cause intimation of all such persons as he may not at the time convict of begging and vagrancy, as hereinbefore provided, to be sent to the inspector of the poor of the parish within which such person shall have been found, in order that their claim, if any, as paupers may be investigated and disposed of according to law; and the magistrate shall direct and cause all such persons to be detained in custody pending such investigation, and the said inspector shall be bound to report to the magistrate the result of such investigation.

The vagrancy offences under the first section are briefly, that (1) 'every person begging,' and (2) 'every person con'ducting himself as a vagrant, having no fixed place of residence, and no lawful means of getting his livelihood,' is guilty of an offence; and the punishment is for a first offence, fine not over 20s. or 30 days' imprisonment, or 30 days without option; and for a second and subsequent, imprisonment not over 60 days. The clause repeats that of the Lindsay Act (sect. 331).

The second clause quoted deals with the offence of sending out to beg, and is substantially repeated from the Lindsay Act (sect. 332). The punishment is a fine of £5, or 30 days.

The third clause allows beggars and vagrants who are not convicted to be sent to the inspector of poor. It is modelled on sect. 333 of the Lindsay Act.

VAGRANCY IN PARTICULAR TOWNS.

Aberdeen, by its Police Act of 1871 (sects. 154, 235, 236 and 237), makes substantially the same provisions, except that there is no provision for a fine, and that the punishment is imprisonment, not exceeding the specified periods.

Edinburgh, by its Police Act of 1879 (sect. 270), makes the same provision as Aberdeen. It has the further provision that sect. 271 renders the parents of children sent out to beg liable to 60 days' imprisonment; and it also empowers children to be sent to 'any institution established by law, or otherwise, for the care of such persons.' Sect. 273 authorises beggars to be handed over to the parochial authorities, and sect. 274 punishes persons harbouring them.

In Dundee, under its Local Act of 1882 (sect. 191), the vagrancy clauses of the Lindsay Act are still in force.

Glasgow, by its Police Act of 1886, has somewhat different provisions. Beggars and vagrants are liable under it to punishment. The definition (sect. 144) of beggar is in substance the ordinary one, but the definition of vagrant is wider, and is as follows:—

Any person who within the city is found wandering abroad, or lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in the open air, or under a tent, or in any cart or waggon, shall be deemed a vagrant unless he proves to the satisfaction of the magistrate that he has a fixed place of residence, and some lawful means of gaining a livelihood within the city.

A beggar or vagrant may, if apparently a fit object for parochial relief, be handed over to the inspector of poor. If not, he may for a first offence be sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment, and for a further offence to 30 days (sect. 145). There is no option of a fine.

Under sect. 146, persons sending out children to beg are liable to imprisonment for not over 30 days.

Under the Greenock Police Acts of 1877 (sect. 178) and 1893, the vagrancy sections of the Lindsay Act are still in force.

COUNTY BYE-LAWS.

Under the Local Government Act of 1889 (sect. 57) the power of dealing locally with the punishment of offences is carried still further, and each County Council is empowered to make its own bye-laws for the repression of begging and vagrancy. Owing to a decision of the Court of Justiciary, showing the uncertainty of the limits within which this power may be exercised, it is at present in a state of suspense (Eastburn v. Wood, 1892, 19 R. 100), and the Secretary for Scotland has recommended the County Councils to wait for further legislation.

Under a Private Act passed in 1849 for the County of Renfrew, 'all vagabonds, public beggars, and idle and disorderly persons found within the said county, who have not a settled place of residence, and follow no lawful employment,' may be sent to a house of correction, and kept to hard labour for a period not exceeding 60 days.

LAWS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

In Appendix xxv., p. 563, at the places referred to by me in the end of the preceding chapter, will be found much information on the Laws of Foreign Countries on vagrancy.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

The evil of vagrancy is much felt in Australia, and good effect is there attributed to their vagrancy laws, the main peculiarity of which seems to be the pretty free use of a power of requiring a person without visible means of subsistence to give a good account of himself to the satisfaction of a magistrate. The following extract from the New South Wales Vagrancy Act of 1851 illustrates this—

Every person who, having no visible lawful means of support, or insufficient lawful means, who shall not—being thereto required by any Justice, or who being duly summoned for such purpose, or who shall be brought before any Justice in pursuance of the provisions of this Act—give a good account of his or her means of support to the satisfaction of such Justice. . . .

And every common prostitute wandering in any street or public highway, or being in any place of public resort, who shall behave in a riotous or indecent manner. . . .

And every habitual drunkard having been thrice convicted of drunkenness within the preceding twelve months, who in any street or public highway, or being in any place of public resort, shall behave in a riotous or indecent manner. . . .

And the holder of every house which shall be frequented by reputed thieves, or persons who have no visible lawful means of support, and every person found in any such house in company with such reputed thieves or persons who shall not (being thereto required by any Justice) give a good account, to the satisfaction of such Justice, of his lawful means of support, and also of being in such house upon some lawful occasion. . . .

And every person wandering abroad or placing himself in any public place, street, highway, court, or passage to beg or gather alms, or causing, or procuring, or encouraging any child or children so to do—shall be deemed an idle or disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of this Act.

III.—INEBRIATES.

Drunkenness in Scotland is not an offence at common law. It was punishable under various old statutes, all now in disuse, and under our old law there was a machinery under which drunkards could be placed under civil disabilities.

OLD PENAL LAW.

Under various statutes passed prior to the Union, and extending over a period of about two centuries and a half, attempts were made to repress excessive drinking by punishment. The Acts are about twenty in number. The earliest (1436, c. 144) appoints those who are found drinking in taverns after nine o'clock to be put in prison. The latest (1693, c. 40) appoints the Presbyteries to prosecute those guilty of drunkenness before the magistrates of the bounds. Between these dates are statutes awarding every degree of punishment. Drunkards, for repeated offences, are to be put in prison 'till they find caution'; for first offences are to be put in the 'jogs,' in the 'stock,' or in 'jail,' for so many hours; or to be fined according to their degree—'the nobleman,' for example, is to be fined 'twenty pounds,' and 'the minister in a fifth part of his stipend.' The statutes had the merit of dealing equally with all, and of being aimed directly at the vice, and not merely at its public manifestation, or at the poorest and most helpless of its victims, but they must have remained largely inoperative, the directions to enforce them being very numerous. Baron Hume, writing in the end of last century, considered some of these penal statutes to be still capable of enforcement. After another century of disuse, they could not, according to Scottish ideas, be now enforced.

OLD CIVIL LAW.

Under the Roman Law the prætor exercised a power of putting persons under curatory, which must have been peculiarly applicable to drunkards. If a person through misconduct wasted his acquired or inherited substance, and threatened thereby to reduce his family to poverty, he could be summoned before the prætor, and interdicted from the management of his affairs. A curator was appointed who managed them for him.

Bankton, one of the most learned of the Scottish lawyers of last century, explains how this law was applicable to Scotland also; and he gives the words of the briefs of summons by which the proceeding could be commenced. That it was ever actually used, he is, however, uncertain. It is clear that the power is now obsolete.

What came in its place was the power of interdiction, of which there were two kinds—judicial and voluntary. These differed from the Roman power in this, that they extended to heritable property only. Under the judicial interdiction a person, 'upon proof of levity and prodigality,' could, at the instance of his heir, be interdicted by the supreme court from the management of his heritage, and have a curator appointed to manage it along with him. This power has long been in disuse, and certainly did not survive the sixteenth century. In the voluntary interdiction the same result was reached, but upon the application of the facile person himself. It is still competent, but it also is going into disuse. It is about fifty years, to the best of my knowledge, since the last instance of it occurred.

There was no power under these laws of sequestrating the person of the drunkard.

CONTINENTAL CIVIL LAW.

On the continent something analogous to the Roman power of interdiction still exists.

In Germany, under the Prussian Civil Code (A. L. R., I. i. sect. 30), if a person through senseless and useless expenditure, or through wilful neglect, sensibly diminishes his means, or involves himself in debt, he may at the instance of his relatives, or of the administrators for the poor, be brought before a tribunal. Upon proof of the allegations, the tribunal will place him under curatory; and, until he reforms, his curator will manage for him. This power, it is obvious, is specially applicable to the case of persons who incapacitate themselves through drinking.

Under the French Civil Code (C. C., sect. 513) a similar power exists. According to it, persons falling under the class dealt with by the Prussian code may have a 'Family Council' appointed to him by a tribunal. When this is done, he cannot, without consent of this council, sue or defend an action, compromise, borrow, or receive and discharge personal estate, or alienate or burden real estate. It will be observed that this differs from the Prussian and Roman systems, in as much as it does not entirely put the person concerned out of the management of his affairs, but still requires his consent to what may be done.

In the note, contributed by Mr Lamond, Appendix xxx., will be found some further elucidations of the preceding points, and also some information as to the Law of Austria.

MODERN LAW.

The offence of being 'drunk and disorderly,' if serious enough to amount to a breach of the peace, is punishable at common law by the sheriff. It may be tried summarily, and may be punished with fine not exceeding £10, or imprisonment for not more than 60 days without option. Caution may be ordered for £20 to keep the peace for six months. This is under Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1864, and Sir William Rae's Act of 1828. Where the offence does not come up to a breach of the peace, it is not punishable at common law.

The so-called offence of being 'drunk and incapable' is punishable under the Public Houses Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35, sect. 23). Under it—

Every person found in a state of intoxication, and incapable of taking care of himself, and not under the care or protection of some suitable person, in any street, thoroughfare, or public place, shall be thereby guilty of an offence and may be taken into custody by any officer of police or constable, and detained in any police office or station house or other convenient place, and not later than in the course of the first lawful day after he shall have been so taken into custody, shall be brought before a sheriff or any one justice of the peace or magistrate, or if not so taken into custody, or if he shall have been liberated on bail or pledge, may be summoned to appear before such a sheriff, justice of the peace, or magistrate, and on being convicted of such offence shall forfeit and pay a penalty of five shillings, and in default of immediate payment shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours.

Under this Act, as indeed under all charges under the like name, it will be observed that no attempt is made to punish the mere drinking to the extent of incapacity. Unless the person be found friendless in some public place he cannot be punished. The operation of this, and all similar statutory provisions is therefore limited to punishing the most unfortunate of the drinking class. It is the only penal provision for cases happening outwith burghs.

Payment of the fine is, I understand, seldom enforced in counties. The justice usually admonishes. According to my experience, such cases are seldom or never brought before the sheriff. During my twenty-eight years of office, all that I can recall is an indistinct recollection of having once seen one.

BURGH POLICE ACTS.

Under the Burgh Police Act of 1892, sect. 381 (24), every person who in any street or public place 'is drunk and incapable, and not under the care and protection of some 'suitable person,' commits an offence, and is liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. or imprisonment (under sect. 501) not exceeding one month. There is a provision for the punishment of habitual drunkards, which will be noticed immediately under that head.

Under the same Act, sect. 380 (9 and 11), the same penalty of 40s., with the same alternative, is imposed on any person who behaves in a riotous, violent, or indecent manner, or who is drunk while in charge, in any street or other place, of a carriage, horse, cattle, or steam engine, or when in possession of loaded firearms.

Under the Aberdeen Police Act of 1862 (sect. 146), every person who is drunk in any public place, and is guilty of any riotous or indecent behaviour therein, is liable to a fine of 40s., or, in the discretion of the magistrate, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding seven days. Persons who are 'drunk and incapable' are dealt with under the Public Houses Act of 1862 quoted above.

Under the Edinburgh Police Act of 1879, persons who are 'drunk and incapable' are liable to a fine of 40s., sect. 247 (6), or to 30 days, sect. 342; and by sect. 248 (4), persons who are 'drunk and guilty of any riotous and 'disorderly conduct,' are liable to a fine of £5, or in the discretion of the magistrate, to imprisonment not exceeding 60 days. In both cases, the magistrate may, instead of, or in addition to, the ordinary penalty, order caution to be found for good behaviour for a year; and may, if it is not found, increase the term of imprisonment to 60 and 90 days respectively (sects. 343 and 344).

In Dundee the law is precisely the same as in Aberdeen.

In Glasgow the definition of 'drunk and incapable' is wider. It includes every person who, in any public place, is 'drunk and incapable of taking care of himself, or of any 'animal or article in his charge.' The penalty is 40s. or 14 days, sect. 149 (31). Every person who is 'riotous, 'disorderly, or indecent in his behaviour,' is liable to a fine of £10, or, without fine if thought right, to 60 days, sect. 135 (5).

In Greenock, under the Act of 1877, the power of punishing the 'drunk and incapable' was the same as in Glasgow. Under the Act of 1893, the provisions on the point of sect. 381 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 are adopted.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.

The expression habitual drunkards is unknown to the common law.

It occurs at least thrice in the public general statutes, and at least once in the local statutes.

In the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, the expression is defined as follows:—

'Habitual drunkard' means a person who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or herself, or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself, and his or her affairs.

The second instance of its use is on the margin of sect. 382 of the Burgh Police Act of 1892. That section is as follows:—

It may be charged as an aggravation of the offence of being drunk and incapable, that the accused person has within the twelve months preceding, been three times previously convicted of such offence; and if the accused person is convicted and such aggravation is proved, the magistrate may impose an additional penalty not exceeding forty shillings in respect of such aggravation, and may sentence such person to imprisonment for any period not exceeding fourteen days, without the option of a fine.

If the magistrate does not exercise his power of imprisoning for fourteen days without option of fine, he may thus fine up to 80s., with the alternative of imprisonment not exceeding one month (see sect. 501). It is not clear whether the power to imprison without fining is cumulative or alternative to the power last mentioned.

The third instance is in the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act of 1894, where a habitual drunkard, who ill-treats his children, may elect to go to a retreat in place of being punished under the Act.

The only provision, so far as I know, in any local act dealing with habitual drunkards, occurs in the Greenock Police Act of 1877. By it (sect. 245) any person who is convicted of being 'drunk and incapable,' and has been six times previously convicted of that offence may be fined 40s., or may be sentenced to imprisonment for any period not exceeding 60 days.

IV.—LOITERING AND IMPORTUNING.

Loitering and importuning is not an offence at common law, and outwith burghs is not punishable. Within burghs the punishment varies between wide extremes.

Under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, sect. 381 (22), it is an offence. Under it, every person who, on a street or public place, 'being a common prostitute or street walker, loiters about or importunes passengers for the purpose of prostitution,' is guilty of an offence, and is liable to be fined 40s., or imprisoned for a month.

To constitute the offence, the person charged must (firstly) be a common prostitute or street walker; and (secondly) must either 'loiters about' or 'importunes' passengers 'for the purpose of prostitution.' It is a difficult statute to apply, as it is difficult to say what length of time a person must hang about a place to constitute loitering, or how persistently she must entreat in order to constitute importuning. In practice, these points seem left very much to be determined according to the opinion of the police constables who bring the complaint.

In Aberdeen, the offence is punishable under the Police Acts of 1862 (sect. 134) and 1871 (sect. 147), with a fine of 40s., or, in the discretion of the magistrate, with imprisonment, not exceeding 14 days. The words constituting the offence are substantially the same as in the Burgh Police Acts, but it is further provided by certain words applicable to it in common with other offences, that the act must be to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers.

Under the Edinburgh Police Act of 1879 the offence is described substantially as in the Burgh Police Act, but the penalty is much higher (sect. 248), being a fine of not over £5, or in the discretion of the magistrate, imprisonment not exceeding 60 days.

Under the Dundee Police Act of 1882 the provisions of the Lindsay Act are still applicable, and these are the same as those of the Burgh Police Act of 1892.

Under the Glasgow Police Act of 1892, sect. 18, the offence and punishment are also the same as in the Burgh Police Act of 1892.

The Greenock Police Act of 1893 adopts the provisions of the Burgh Police Act of 1892 on the point.

V.—JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

The Industrial Schools Act, 1866, and its amending acts, deals with three classes of children under three separate sections.

Under sect. 14 children are dealt with who are

- (a.) Found begging.
- (b.) Found [I.] wandering and [II.] not having [1] any home, or [2] settled place of abode, or [3] proper guardianship, or [4] visible means of subsistence.
- (c.) Found destitute, or an orphan, or having a surviving parent who is in prison or in penal servitude.
- (d.) Frequenting thieves.

All these children, if under 14, may be sent to an Industrial School.

I understand difficulties have arisen in applying these provisions in regard to dealing with wandering children. Under the Act, these cannot be sent, if they possess any one of the four things mentioned in the second portion of the clause (b.). Usually there is no difficulty about the first, second, and fourth. I have heard it suggested that if the wandering child had any kind of parents, it could not be said to be without 'proper guardianship,' but I do not think it can be so interpreted, and I have always held that if the parents were drunken, or ill-treated their children, those children, if found wandering through the country, whether with or without the parents, came under the Act.

Under sect. 14, children under 12, charged with crime, can be sent. These are not convicted, and if they ever have been convicted, cannot be sent. In my own practice, I may mention that I never, if I could possibly help it, allowed a conviction to be recorded against a child under 12, for fear of losing the power of sending it to an Industrial School.

Under sect. 16, unmanageable children could be sent at their parents' request. For these, the allowance made by the treasury is smaller.

Under sect. 17, Parochial Boards can send children.

Under the Act of 1880, children living with prostitutes, or frequenting their company, can be sent.

Certain other statutes also contain provisions for sending children to Industrial Schools, but it is only exceptionally that they are used. Among these may be mentioned the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894.

The period for which children are sent is defined as such time as the magistrate thinks right, but in no case is there power to keep the child beyond the attaining of the age of 16. The Act of 1894 provides (with reference to children admitted after its date) that they are to remain after their liberation from the school until they attain the age of 18 under the supervision and control of the directors.

In practice the children are usually committed till that age be attained.

There is a most beneficial power to the managers to license out the children after they have been educated for a certain time. This power might, I think with great advantage, be more used in Scotland.

Power exists to order the parents to contribute to the support of the children in schools.

Additional information as to children will be found in the Memorandum by Miss Stevenson, p. 561.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

Admission to reformatory schools, under the Act of 1866 is now regulated by sect. 1 of the Act of 1893:—

Where a youthful offender, who, in the opinion of the court before whom he is charged, is less than sixteen years of age, is convicted, whether on indictment or by a court of summary jurisdiction, of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, and either (a) appears to the court to be not less than twelve years of age; or (b) is proved to have been previously convicted of an offence punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment,—the court may, in addition to, or in lieu of sentencing him according to law to any punishment, order that he be sent to a certified reformatory school, and be there detained for a period of not less than three and not more than five years, so, however, that the period is such as will, in the opinion of the court, expire at or before the time at which the offender will attain the age of nineteen years.

In practice, the reformatory school is for children over 12. In Aberdeenshire, at least, children under 12 are, wherever it is practicable, sent to industrial schools. In practice, I also found it advisable rarely or never to send to a reformatory, except for a second offence, even when the children were over 12. I found that very few indeed of those who were warned for a first offence ever came back.

There is also a power of letting out from reformatories on license. This,—unfortunately as I venture to think,—is little used in Scotland.

There is a valuable power of apprenticing given under Act of 1891, sect. 1., to which the same remark—that it is unfortunately too little used—is equally applicable.

DETENTION OF JUVENILES.

The detention of juvenile offenders or neglected children before trial, or before sending to industrial or reformatory school, is regulated under the Industrial Schools Act of 1866, sect. 19, and under the Reformatories Act of 1893. Under these, the child can be sent to a poorhouse, or to another place, not being a prison, for detention for a period not exceeding 14 days. The power is also given of detaining in prison children who are liable to be committed to Reformatories, but such children only.

Under these powers there is no difficulty in any magistrate avoiding the sending of all unconvicted, and, in many cases, of convicted children to prison.

WHIPPING.

Whipping at one time was a very frequent punishment in Scotland for all classes of offenders. As specimens of the kind of sentences which magistrates were in the way of pronouncing during last century may be instanced the case of a man who was sentenced 'to be whipped through the town,' and of a woman—certainly a very bad character—who was sentenced to be 'privately scourged, and thereafter to be drummed out off and banished from the Burgh.' The power having fallen into disuse, its use was revived in 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 105, sect. 74) for males, under 14 years of age, who were guilty of offences for which it is competent to imprison, or to fine with the alternative of imprisonment. The whipping may be imposed instead of imprisonment, or in addition to it. From the way in which the Act is worded, it has been thought doubtful whether a whipping can be made the alternative for failure to pay a fine, although there are many cases where such an alternative if it did not effectually recover the fine, would at least prevent the necessity for the juvenile being sent to prison. The regulations under which whipping is carried out are given at p. 586.

JUVENILES IN AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

Much attention has been given in Australia to the subject of Juvenile Delinquency, and excellent results appear to have been obtained. The Colony of Victoria may be cited as affording a good instance of their legislation. In it, Juveniles are dealt with either under the Neglected Children's Act, or the Juvenile Offenders Act, both of 1887.

The Neglected Children's Act is applicable to any person under the age of 21. Receiving Houses, Probationary and Industrial Schools are established under it, and are maintained partly by private contributions, and partly by Government aid. The persons who may be committed to them are defined thus :—

SECT. 18. Every child who answers to any of the following descriptions shall be deemed a 'neglected child' within the meaning of this Act, that is to say every child apparently under the age of seventeen years :—

- [1] Found begging or receiving alms, or being in any street or public place for the purpose of begging or receiving alms ; [2] Found wandering about or frequenting any street, thoroughfare, tavern or place of public resort or sleeping in the open air, and who has not any home or settled place of abode or any visible means of subsistence ; [3] Associating or dwelling with any person known or reputed to be a thief or drunkard or with any person convicted of vagrancy under any Act now or hereafter to be in force, whether the person so known, reputed, or convicted is the parent of the child or not ; [4] Having committed an offence punishable by some less punishment than imprisonment :

And every child apparently under the age of ten years found engaged in any casual employment during the months of May, June, July, August or September, after the hour of seven o'clock in the evening or at any other part of the year after the hour of nine o'clock in the evening.

SECT. 21. Every child apparently under the age of sixteen years found by any senior constable, sergeant of police, or officer of police of superior grade to a sergeant, or by any person specially authorized by the Governor in Council in that behalf, residing in a brothel or associating or dwelling with a prostitute, whether the mother of the child or not, shall be immediately apprehended by such constable, sergeant, or officer or person, without any warrant, and forthwith taken before some two or more neighbouring justices to be dealt with according to this Act.

SECT. 23. If the guardian of any child under the age of fifteen years represents to two or more justices and proves to their satisfaction that he is unable to control such child, such justices may order that, upon such guardian entering into security to the satisfaction of the clerk of the court for payment of such sums as such justices may fix for the maintenance of such child, such child be committed to the care of the Department for neglected children.

The powers of dealing with the children after committal are extensive and varied. They are thus defined :—

SECT. 37. Subject to the Regulations of the Governor in Council every ward of the Department for neglected children may from time to time be dealt with by the Secretary in one or other of the following ways :—

- [1] Placed in some receiving depot ; [2] Boarded out with some suitable person ; [3] Placed at service with some suitable person ; [4] Apprenticed to some trade either on land or at sea ; [5] Placed in the custody of some suitable person who may be willing to take charge of such ward ; [6] Detained in some industrial or probationary school ; [7] Transferred with the approval of the Minister to some reformatory school to which such ward might be lawfully committed :

Provided always that in case it shall come to the knowledge of the Minister that any ward after the commencement of this Act committed to the care of the Department for neglected children has been leading an immoral or depraved life, such ward shall be transferred to a reformatory school unless under the special circumstances of any case the Minister may think that it would be inexpedient, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary to take the proper steps for that purpose.

Children may also (under sect. 33) be apprenticed.

Parents of children may be made to contribute towards their maintenance in detention, a periodical sum fixed by a magistrate.

A distinct feature of the system is the power, where the Government makes no contribution, to the justices to commit children to the care of approved private persons or institutions.

The period of detention is in both cases the same, namely, till the age of 18, or till such higher age not exceeding 21 as the Secretary of State shall approve.

Under the Juvenile Offenders Act, Reformatory Schools are established, similar to those in this country. Under it persons under 17, convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment, may if apparently over 12 be sent to a Reformatory, and if under 12 may be dealt with under the Neglected Children's Act. There is a special provision by which children under 12 who have been leading a depraved or immoral life may also be sent to a Reformatory. The period of detention is until 18, or till such greater age as the Secretary of State may fix, not exceeding 20.

J. DOVE WILSON.

APPENDIX XXII.

MEMORANDUM by Miss FLORA C. STEVENSON, on the Acts 1872, Education of Vagrant and Tinker Children, with 35, 36 Vic. Summary of the Compulsory Clauses of the Education cap. 62, sects. 69, 70.

Under the provisions of the Scottish Education Acts, every parent or guardian is bound to provide elementary education for his children between the ages of 5 and 14 years, until they can pass the standard of exemption prescribed by the Scottish Education Code in force for the time being (Act 1872, sect. 69). Standard V. is at present the standard of exemption.

Failure to educate his children by a parent or guardian, without 'reasonable excuse,' is a violation of the law:—(1) Sickness or other unavoidable cause ; and (2) there being no public school within three miles are deemed to be reasonable excuses (Act 1883, sect. 11). Act 1883, 46 & 47 Vic. cap. 56, sect. 11.

It is the duty of every School Board to enforce this law, and to appoint an officer to ascertain what parents, within the School Board district, have failed to educate their children.

A defaulting parent, after due warning, is summoned before a statutory meeting of the School Board. If he fails to appear, or on appearance, fails to satisfy the Board that he has had reasonable excuse for his neglect, the Board can order his prosecution before a court of summary jurisdiction by the Procurator-Fiscal, or some other person appointed by the Board.

On conviction, the parent is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s., or to imprisonment not exceeding 14 days. The parent so convicted may also be found liable to expenses up to 20s. Prosecutions may be repeated at intervals of not less than one month (Act 1872, sects. 70, 71 ; Act 1878, sect. 28).

An alternative mode of procedure is provided under the Acts of 1883 and 1893. Act 1883, 46 & 47 Vic. cap. 56, sect. 9.

By this procedure a defaulting parent, 'after due warning' by the School Board, may be summoned before the court, and the child, in respect of whom the complaint against the parent is made, may be ordered by the court to attend some public or State-aided school named in the order (Act 1883, sect. 9), or a day Industrial School, if the parent is willing to pay for him at such day Industrial School (Act 1893, sect. 9). (An order under this section is called an Attendance Order.) Act 1883, sect. 9. Act 1893, sect. 3 (4).

If a parent fails to comply with an attendance order, by securing his child's attendance at the school named in the order, he may again be summoned before the court without further warning, and on failing to appear, or on appearance, to satisfy the court that he has used every means to enforce compliance with the order, the court may impose the same penalty as under sect. 70 of the Act of 1872. But if the court is satisfied that he has used all reasonable efforts, and that the non-compliance is due to the truancy of the child, the court, without inflicting any penalty, may order the child to be sent to a certified day Industrial School, or to a certified Industrial School. Act 1893, 56 Vic. cap. 12, sect. 4 (1).

In a second or subsequent non-compliance with the order, the court may inflict the penalty, besides ordering the child to be sent to a Day Industrial or Industrial School. The order under this section must specify the time of detention, which must not exceed three years, nor extend beyond the time when the child will be 14 years of age. Sect. (2).

A child sent to an Industrial School under this order may, after one month, be licensed to live out of school, and attend an ordinary public or inspected day school, and must be so licensed after three months. In case of the child failing to attend the day school regularly, the license would be revoked, and the child again sent to the Industrial School. Sect 5.

Any person may inform the School Board of any child in their district who is not being educated in conformity to the Education Acts, and it is the duty of the School Board to take proceedings in such case, unless for reasons to be recorded in their minutes. Act 1883, sect. 12.

PROVISIONS OF THE EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACTS AS TO EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN.

Regular Employment.

No child under 10 can be so employed.

No child, between 10 and 14, unless he has passed the standard of exemption, or unless he has passed the Act 1878, sect. 5.

third standard and is attending school as a half-timer, in accordance with sect. 23 of the Factory and Workshops Act 1878, can be regularly employed.

No child under 11 can be employed in a factory or workshop, and no child under 13 can be employed full time.

Casual Employment.

This means all employment for gain outside of the child's own home not otherwise regulated by Act of Parliament.

No child under 10 can be employed casually.

No child between 10 and 14 can be casually employed after 9 P.M. from 1st April to 1st October, or after 7 P.M. from 1st October to 1st April, unless he has passed the standard of exemption.

School Boards may give exemptions from this prohibition (1) to any child for a period or periods, not exceeding 6 weeks in all, between 1st January and 31st December in any year (1878, sect. 6), by a writing under the hand of the clerk of the School Board; (2) and they may also, if they think fit, give exemption, by public notice, in the case of children above 8 years of age, during harvest or the fishing season, for a period not exceeding 6 weeks as above (sect. 7); and persons contravening this Act are liable, on conviction, to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

By the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act 1894, further restrictions are imposed on the employment of children—

Any person causing or procuring a boy under fourteen, or a girl under sixteen, to beg in the street under pretence of performing or selling, or to perform or sell in the street or in a public house, between 10 P.M. and 5 A.M., or causing or procuring any child under ten to perform or sell in the street or in any public house or place of public amusement, is liable to fine or imprisonment.—Sellar's Manual of the Education Act, p. 28.

Persons contravening this Act are liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding £25, or alternatively, or in default of payment of fine, or in addition thereto to imprisonment with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding 3 months (Act 1894, sect. 2 a).

But School Boards (in Scotland) may grant a license to a child above 7 years of age to be employed in theatres or other places of public amusement under such restrictions as the Board thinks fit (sect. 3, 1).

In the case of the children of vagrants and tinkers, the laws under which compulsory education can be enforced, whether under the provisions of the Act of 1872 or the Acts of 1883 and 1893, have apparently been practically inoperative. Because (1) the responsible parents or guardians of these children are never long enough in one school district to allow of the necessary procedure being fully carried out: the initial procedure 'of due warning' resulting in the immediate removal of the family to another district; and because (2) it is alleged that children, living in the state of physical dirt and degradation common to vagrants and tinkers, could not be admitted to any ordinary public school. Even if School Boards did institute proceedings against a defaulting parent of this class, they could only prosecute if they could certify that he had, without 'reasonable excuse,' failed to discharge his duty to his children. 'Reasonable excuse' being defined as 'unavoidable cause,' the parent could undoubtedly plead the condition of his life which necessitated his constant removal from one place to another as a 'reasonable excuse.'

The only existing legislation which can meet the case of these children are the Industrial School Acts, the provisions of which are detailed in Professor Dove Wilson's Notes.

A clearer definition of the classes of children who may be detained in certificated Industrial Schools, however, seems necessary. Under sect. 14 of the Act of 1866, the definition 'children found wandering, and not having any 'home or settled place of abode,' exactly describes the tinker children, but the further description, 'not having proper 'guardianship,' and 'not having visible means of sustenance,' does not apply to them, as they are seldom found apart from their parents or guardians. A combination of these descriptions is apparently required to qualify a child for detention in an Industrial School under this section of the Act.

Legislation on the lines of the Movable Dwellings Bill, introduced in 1892, dealing with the education of children using movable dwellings, might, with modification to suit the law of Scotland as regards education, be made applicable to the case of tinker and vagrant children.

Clause 8 of the Bill is as follows:—

A child using as a place of abode a movable dwelling shall, for the purposes of the Education Acts, be deemed to be resident within the school district in which such movable dwelling is for the time being situate, and shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the school authority for such district in the same manner as children permanently resident therein, subject to the following provisions:—

- (a.) The bye-laws set forth in the schedule to this Act shall extend to the child and his parent in substitution for the bye-laws made by the school authority under the Education Acts, and as if they were those bye-laws, and the fine imposed by the bye-laws may be recovered accordingly;
- (b.) A copy of the bye-laws in the schedule to this Act shall be given by the county authority to the owner of every movable dwelling upon his registering the same in pursuance of this Act;
- (c.) The sanitary authority, within whose district the movable dwelling used as an abode by the child is for the time being situate, shall assist the school authority in carrying out the objects of this Act by giving information and otherwise, and for this purpose shall report to the school authority every infraction in the case of the child, either of the Education Acts, or of the bye-laws, which may come to the knowledge of the sanitary authority;
- (d.) The power to make bye-laws given by this Act to the Education Departments shall include power to make regulations with respect to the use and form of certificates or pass books as to attendance at school to be used by children living in movable dwellings.

FLORA C. STEVENSON.

APPENDIX XXIII.

MEMORANDUM by JOHN SIBBALD, M.D., Commissioner in Lunacy for Scotland, 'on the Position 'of Pauper Lunatics in Private Dwellings, and of 'Persons in Private Dwellings under six months' 'certificates, in Scotland,' for Sir CHARLES CAMEBON, Bart., M.P., Chairman of the Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders.

December 1894.

Pauper lunatics in Scotland are provided for either in establishments—i.e., asylums and lunatic wards of poor-houses—or in private dwellings. There were, on the 1st of January 1894, 8476 in establishments and 2565 in private dwellings.

Pauper lunatics in private dwellings are either placed singly, that is, one lunatic in each house, or in groups of from two to four in houses called specially licensed houses. The word license is used in the Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 54, sect. 5), which refers to these houses; but the licensing merely indicates that they are private dwellings into which more than one, and not more than four, lunatics may be admitted who are regarded by the Board as suitable for private dwellings. The Board do not encourage the admission of more than two patients into one house, and they only sanction the admission of more than two after consideration of a special report by a Deputy Commissioner.

The application for a special license to a house in which pauper lunatics are to be received is made by the inspector of poor of the parish to which the pauper lunatics belong who are to be placed in the house.

The pauper lunatics in private dwellings are placed either under the care of relatives or of unrelated persons. On 1st January, 991 were with relatives, and 1574 were with unrelated persons. Of the 1574, more than 1000 were in specially licensed houses.

Every pauper lunatic in a private dwelling is placed there under the sanction of the Board. This sanction is only granted where the Board is satisfied that the residence of the patient in an asylum is not required either in the interest of the public or for the welfare of the patient. The application for the sanction of the Board is made by the Inspector of Poor of the parish to which the patient belongs, and is accompanied by a statement and medical certificates showing the condition of the patient and the suitability of the circumstances in which he is to be placed for his proper care and treatment. Sanction is only granted in cases where the patients are regarded as capable of enjoying the liberty of ordinary family life. The sanction is not given as an authority for the patient's detention, though its existence justifies the guardian in having an insane inmate in his house. The sanction is given to the Inspector of Poor and not to the guardian. No communication is made by the Board to the guardian on the subject. The necessity for using force in the detention of a patient would be regarded by the Board as evidence that the patient was not suitable for residence in a private dwelling. The Board do not regard it as desirable that a guardian should have authority to detain a patient by force, and I have no doubt that they would do what they could to prevent the power of forcible detention being conferred by statute.

The payment made to an unrelated guardian who receives a pauper lunatic is determined, under the sanction of the Board, by the Parochial Board in each case, and it varies from about five shillings a week to seven shillings a week. In addition to this payment, the Parochial Board provides clothing for the patient. When a patient lives with relatives the payment may be much less, and is, in some cases very much less, the payment in such a case being merely a contribution towards the cost of maintenance, supplementary to what may be properly borne by the relatives.

A pauper lunatic in a private dwelling is expected to take his or her place as a member of the household, sharing in the work and in the domestic life of the guardian, as far as his or her condition permits. Unkindness of any sort leads to the removal of the patient.

The patients are visited twice a year or oftener by the Inspector of Poor of either the parish of chargeability or the parish of residence, and four times a year by a medical man employed by the parish of chargeability. A record of each visit is made, in a book kept by the guardian, stating, according to a prescribed form, the condition in which the patient was found and the way in which the duties of the guardian are performed.

The patients are also inspected once a year or oftener by one of the Deputy Commissioners in Lunacy, who examines the Visitation Book of the inspector of poor and medical officer, and makes a report on the occasion of each visit, in regard to the whole circumstances of the case to the General Board.

The above refers to pauper lunatics in private dwellings. I was, however, asked to explain also the position of persons not paupers, and not certified to be lunatics, who are received for temporary residence in private houses, without any sanction by the Board being required. These persons are usually spoken of as being under six months' certificates.

The position of a person receiving a patient under a six months' certificate is that such person is not subject either to the requirements or to the penalty indicated in sect. 13 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 51. This section requires that no person shall receive or keep any person as a lunatic for gain without the order of the sheriff or the sanction of the Board, and any person so receiving or keeping a lunatic becomes liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; but it is added that the enactments of this section do not apply to any case where the person received has been sent to a house for the purpose of temporary residence not exceeding six months, and under a medical certificate, stating that the malady is not confirmed, and that the certifier considers it expedient with a view to his recovery that he should be placed in the house for temporary residence. The granting of such a certificate does not confer any authority to detain the patient; it merely absolves the person receiving the patient from complying with the other requirements of section 13. The placing of a person under such a certificate does not require to be reported to the General Board, and that Board is not called on to exercise any supervision in regard to the case.

The sections of Acts of Parliament having special reference to pauper lunatics in private dwellings are:—

Section 95, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 71.

" 5, 25 & 26 " c. 54.

" 13, 29 & 30 " c. 51.

The following documents are appended to this memorandum:—

1. Copy of the form of application to the Board for their sanction to the residence of a pauper lunatic in a private dwelling.
2. Copy form of sanction issued on such application.
3. Copy of an application to the Board for a special license.
4. Copy of Visitation Book for Inspectors of Poor and Medical Officers.

APPENDIX XXIV.

LETTER from Sheriff GUTHRIE SMITH, Commissioner in Lunacy, to the Chairman of Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, &c.

66 OXFORD TERRACE, HYDE PARK,
LONDON, 20th Dec. 1894.

DEAR SIR CHARLES CAMERON,—When I had the pleasure of seeing you last week in Aberdeen, I promised to send you a note of the jurisdiction exercised by the General Board of Lunacy in Scotland under the Lunacy Statutes,—which I am now able to do.

The General Board has supervision of all lunatics who are:—(1) Pauper lunatics; or (2) Detained in an asylum; or (3) Kept in a private house for gain; or (4) Are under curatory.

In regard to No. 3, I may explain that a patient may be kept for profit in a private house by order of the sheriff; but such order is not necessary—the sanction of the General Board being sufficient for his reception and detention. Persons so kept are not free to leave and take up their abode elsewhere, and are not allowed to wander far away; and to that extent their liberty is interfered with. But practically they are simply boarders—free to go in and out, like other members of the family. When greater restraint becomes necessary, they will be ordered by the Board to an asylum, as in their opinion a private house is the worst possible place for restraint, which ought never to be exercised without the safeguards provided by an asylum.

As regards patients not kept for gain or profit in a private house, and not compulsorily detained, the Board has no jurisdiction, the theory of the law being that private patients living in family, who are neither kept for profit, nor subject to compulsion or restraint, nor grossly neglected or cruelly used, do not require the intervention of the State.

When, however, a lunatic, whether kept for profit or not, is under restraint or coercion,—within the house—and his illness has been longer than a year, he comes under the supervision of the Commissioners who, for the reasons above stated, would probably order his removal to an asylum. (See sections 13 and 14 of 29 & 30 Vict., cap. 51, 1866.)

These two sections are not quite consistent. In the incipient stage of mental disease it is often expedient to give the patient a chance of getting better, and yet avoid the stigma of insanity by placing him in a temporary residence, where he can be adequately treated, and this can be done without the precedent sanction of the Commissioners on a medical certificate, but not for a longer time than six months. The statute does not say what is to be done with him during the next six months, at the end of which the authority of the Commissioners begins to run. To make the two provisions consistent, the period of probation should be extended to 12 months, when, according to the theory of the statute, he may be dealt with as a person whose mental disorder is of a confirmed character.

From this review you will observe that, except the slight extent to which the personal liberty of a lunatic is interfered with in cases where he is kept in a private house for profit, with the sanction of the Commissioners, it may be assumed that no lunatic is suffered to be detained compulsorily in a private house, or subjected to restraint, with the sanction of the Commissioners, whether he is kept for profit or not.

I need not add that I shall be glad, so far as I can, to answer any further inquiries, and am, yours very faithfully,

J. GUTHRIE SMITH,
Commissioner in Lunacy.

Sir C. Cameron, Bart., M.P.

APPENDIX XXV.

MEMORANDUM on Vagrancy and Drunkenness on the Continent by Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY

CONTROL OF VAGRANTS.

For regulating and controlling all that class of people who travel about without work or occupation and without any means of subsistence, a special law was created in 1885, the so-called 'vagrant law,' of which the following paragraphs specially relate to the treatment of 'tramps' and beggars:—

SECT. 1. Whoever travels about without occupation or work, and who is not in a position to show that he possesses the means for his subsistence, or that he tries to earn them in an honest way, is to be punished as a vagrant.

The punishment is severe arrest from one to three months; there may also be adjudged one or more increases of this punishment, as indicated in sect. 253 (a to e) of the penal code of the 27th May 1852.

SECT. 2. For begging, the punishment is severe arrest of from eight days to three months.

The court may in case of a condemnation pronounce in the verdict the admissibility of retention in a forcing workhouse.

With regard to the verdict of admissibility of retention in a forcing workhouse, appeal may be made in favour of the accused if the verdict is for retention and against the accused if the verdict is not for retention.

The efforts made for converting beggars and tramps into self-supporting members of society consist in placing them into forced workhouses, as indicated in the 'vagrant law,' or into houses of correction, but the success obtained so far has not been very satisfactory. The best results as yet are obtained with youthful vagrants and criminals in houses of correction specially established for them.

BELGIUM.

CONTROL OF VAGRANTS.

Three features in it deserve careful study :—

First. The measures adopted to prevent confirmed mendicity and vagrancy.

Second. The equitable distribution of expense, by which the inmates of public institutions shall not be unduly increased on the one hand, nor become, on the other hand, excessively burdensome.

Third. The emphasis placed upon treatment of the young by separating them from old and confirmed offenders.

M. Thiry, professor of criminal law in the University of Liege, writes :—'If you would succeed in diminishing vagrancy and begging, as well as crime, give more attention to the children.'

In regard to efforts for the conversion of beggars and tramps into self-supporting members of society, it may be said that before the new law, which came into force on January 1, 1892, there existed in Belgium institutions of reform for tramps and beggars, but it seems they had small success. In the department for the younger delinquents they were generally worse when leaving than when entering, and so these institutions were a mere preparation for the poorhouse or even the prison. The poorhouse was a failure as an institution of reform. On account of the mixing of the confined, without consideration as to age and morality, the bad did not improve, and the partially good became entirely spoiled. This deterioration is taken into consideration, as will be seen by the perusal of the new law. The schools of charity and the poorhouses, with the separation provided for the confined according to their ages, have been considered as the most important means for improvement.

BELGIAN MENDICITY AND VAGRANCY LAW OF 27th NOVEMBER, 1891.

ART. 1. For the repression of vagrancy and begging, the Government will organise institutions of correction under the name of poorhouses, asylums, and schools of charity.

ART. 2. The institutions of correction mentioned in the preceding article are exclusively used for the confinement of individuals whom the judicial authority has put at the disposal of the Government to be shut up in a workhouse.

The asylums mentioned in the same article are exclusively devoted to the confinement of individuals the judicial authorities put at the disposal of the Government to be confined in an asylum and individuals whose confinement in an asylum is requested by the authority of the commune.

The schools of charity are devoted to persons who are under 18 years of age and have been put by judicial authority at the disposal of the Government, or whose admission has been asked for by the authority of the commune.

ART. 3. The individuals over 18 years, whose admission in an asylum has been asked for by the authority of the commune, will be admitted there when they present themselves voluntarily provided with the copy of the decree of a board of the borgomaster and aldermen authorising their admission.

ART. 4. When the admission in an asylum has been requested by a commune administration, the maintaining costs will be at the expense of the commune.

ART. 5. The individuals under 21 years confined in the poorhouses are entirely separated from the inmates above this age.

ART. 6. The able-bodied individuals confined in a poorhouse or in an asylum will be compelled to labour as prescribed in the establishment.

They are to receive daily wages, except when withdrawn for disciplinary measures, on which a reserve is made in order to form their leaving fund.

The minister of justice will determine the several categories in which the inmates will be classed, and according to the labour in which they are employed is determined the rate of the wages and the amount of the reserve.

The leaving fund is given one part in ready money, the other in clothes and tools.

ART. 7. The interior rules and the discipline of the establishments are regulated by royal decree.

The prisoners can be subjected to solitary confinement.

ART. 8. Each individual found in state of vagrancy will be arrested and arraigned before the police court.

Souteneurs of prostitutes are classed as vagrants.

However, the decision of the judge of peace concerning the souteneurs may be appealed during the period provided for by the code of criminal instruction.

ART. 9. Every individual found begging can be arrested and arraigned before the police court.

ART. 10. The adult and able-bodied foreigners not residing in Belgium, who are found begging or in a state of vagrancy, can be immediately brought back to the boundary.

ART. 11. By derogation of Article 3 of the law of May 1, 1849, the individuals arrested by virtue of the present law can be provisionally liberated by the public ministry or by the tribunals.

ART. 12. The judges of peace verify the identity, age, physical state, the mental state, and the kind of life of individuals arraigned before the tribunal of police for vagrancy as begging.

ART. 13. They put at the disposal of the Government, to be confined in a poorhouse for two years at least and seven years at most, the able-bodied individuals who, instead of obtaining from work their means of subsistence, speculate upon charity as professional beggars; also the individuals who by idleness, drunkenness, and immorality live in vagrancy and souteneurs of loose women.

ART. 14. The correctional courts can put at the disposal of the Government, to be confined in a poorhouse for a year at least and seven years at most, after having undergone their penalty, the vagrants and beggars whom they will condemn to a confinement of less than a year for an infraction provided for by the penal legislation.

ART. 15. The minister of justice may set free the confined individuals in a poorhouse whose confinement he judges unnecessary to prolong up to the term fixed by the tribunal.

ART. 16. The judges of peace may put at the disposal of the Government, to be confined in an asylum, the individuals found in vagrancy or begging, without any of the circumstances mentioned herebefore in Article 13.

ART. 17. The individuals confined in the asylums will be set free when their leaving fund has reached the amount fixed by the minister of justice for the several categories in which these inmates have been classed, and according to the trade they follow.

ART. 18. The individuals confined in an asylum can not in any case be kept there above a year against their will. The minister of justice may set free every individual confined in an asylum whose confinement he judges not to be any longer necessary.

ART. 19. The Government may at any time bring back to the boundaries the individuals of foreign nationality who have been put at his disposal to be confined in a poorhouse or asylum.

ART. 20. The board of directors of the asylum will present to the inmates, upon their leaving the establishment, a certificate mentioning their stay in the house, with attestation of good behaviour, if this is the case.

ART. 21. The cost of maintaining individuals, confined in a poorhouse, in consequence of a decision of the judicial authority, has to be borne up to a third part by the commune of their residence of assistance. The remainder has to be divided by halves between the state and the province.

It will be the same with the cost of maintaining able-bodied individuals confined in the asylums.

When an individual, confined in a poorhouse or asylum in consequence of a decision of the judicial authority, has no residence of assistance in Belgium and his residence of assistance can not be found out, the maintaining costs to be borne by the commune of assistance, according to the preceding paragraph, will be borne by the province in which he has been arrested and arraigned before justice.

If souteneurs are concerned, these costs are borne by the commune on the territory of which he has speculated on debauchery.

ART. 22. The part falling to the commune in the maintaining costs of individuals confined in the poorhouses has to be borne by the treasury of the commune.

The part falling to the commune in the maintaining costs of able-bodied or invalid individuals confined in the asylums has to be borne by the almshouses and the boards of charity without prejudice to the subsidies of the commune in case of insufficiency of the resources of these institutions.

ART. 23. When an individual, put at the disposal of the Government to be confined in an asylum, is declared an invalid by the directors of the house, the maintaining costs, except the case of wounds or sickness occurring during the confinement, have to be borne, as long as the incapacity for work remains, by the commune of his residence of assistance. The directors to give immediately notice of it to the commune of the residence of assistance.

ART. 24. When the individual arraigned before the tribunal of police in consequence of article 8 or article 9 of the present law is not fully 18 years of age, the judge of peace, if the state of habitual begging or vagrancy is proved, will order that he may be put at the disposal of the Government to be confined, up to his being of age, in a school of charity.

ART. 25. When an individual who is not fully 16 years of age is arraigned before the police court for an infraction that the law punishes with a confinement less than eight days, a fine less than 26 francs or those two penalties combined, the judge of peace, even in the case of second offence, will not condemn him to the confinement nor the fine, but according to the nature and gravity of the act will dismiss him from the prosecution or put him at the disposal of the Government until his being of age.

The prosecution practised according to articles 24 and 25 will not be mentioned in the information furnished afterwards respecting the prosecuted individuals.

ART. 26. The courts and tribunals may, when condemning to confinement an individual under 18 years of age, order him to remain at the disposal of the Government from the expiration of his penalty until his being of age.

The condemnation in this case will be executed within eight days from the date of condemnation.

ART. 27. The individuals put at the disposal of the Government in virtue of articles 25 and 26 of the present law, will be confined in a school of charity of the state.

ART. 28. If, in consequence of an error committed in the ascertaining of his age, an individual under 18 years has been put at the disposal of the Government to be confined in a poorhouse, the transfer into a state school of charity will be ordered immediately by the minister of justice. The transfer into an asylum would equally be immediately ordered by the minister of justice if an individual being aged more than 18 had been put at the disposal of the Government to be confined in a state school of charity.

ART. 29. The individuals under 13 years at the date of their entering a state school of charity will stay, during the whole duration of their confinement, completely separated from the individuals entered at a more advanced age.

Equally the individuals entered into a state school of charity at the age of 13 years and less than 16 years will remain during the whole duration of their confinement separated from the individuals entered at a more advanced age.

ART. 30. The individuals put at the disposal of the Government according to articles 24, 25, and 26 of the present law, or in virtue of article 72 of the penal code, after having been confined in a state school of charity during six months without interruption, can be placed in apprenticeship with a farmer or an artisan; they can also, with the assent of their parents or tutors be placed in a public or private establishment for instruction or charity.

ART. 31. The individuals confined in the state school of charity can be returned, conditionally, to their parents or tutors, by decision of the minister of justice if they present sufficient guarantees of morality, and are able to supervise conveniently their child or pupil.

ART. 32. The individuals returned conditionally to their parents or tutor, as provided by the preceding article, can be reinstated up to their being of age, in a state school of charity by decision of the minister of justice, when it is acknowledged that their stay with their parents or their tutor has become dangerous to their morality.

ART. 34. The cost of maintenance and education of the individuals placed in the state schools of charity are at the expense of the state for one-half and for the other half at the expense of the commune of their residence of assistance, if they have been put at the disposal of the Government by a decision of the judicial authority or by the commune that has asked for their admission. When an individual confined in a state school of charity, in virtue of a decision of the judicial authority, has no residence of assistance in Belgium, and when his residence can not be found out, the costs for maintenance and education which would be at the expense of the commune of assistance according to the preceding paragraph, have to be borne by the province or the territory of which he has been arrested or arraigned before the tribunal.

ART. 39. The following persons are punished by a confinement of eight days to three months :—

(1) The person who compels a child under 16 years to beg habitually.

(2) The person who has furnished a child under 16 years or an invalid to a beggar, who has employed this child or invalid to solicit public charity.

In case of the second offence the penalty can be doubled.

The tribunals have the right to apply article 85 of the penal code.

In virtue of the law of November 27, 1891, simple mendicancy and vagrancy are no longer considered as crimes and punished by imprisonment. To prevent committal of crimes, vicious mendicants and vagrants may be imprisoned. Those not thoroughly bad and depraved are sent to a house of refuge, an institution closely resembling our charity asylums. Under this law, persons and inmates of the various Government institutions are confined in separate quarters according to age, degree of perversity, &c.

ANTWERP.

CONTROL OF VAGRANTS.

The local police authorities are charged with the duty of apprehending all persons found begging or in a state of vagrancy. Persons arrested for these causes are summoned before a police tribunal and are subject to a sentence of confinement of from two to seven years, according to the character of the offence, their capacity to work, &c., in all cases of able-bodied persons fit to work and who apparently prefer a life of vagabondage, &c.

The places of confinement are known as benevolent agricultural colonies, two of which for men are located in the province of Antwerp.

All persons sent to these institutions are compelled to do a certain amount of work, dependent in a measure upon their physical capacity, under the surveillance of a military guard.

These institutions are similar to the workhouses of the United States.

'Tramps' are not often converted from their ways, and cases are known where men have passed years at one of these institutions, where they are well fed and clad.

The expenses of these colonies are paid out of the communal and provincial funds, although the institutions themselves are under the supervision of the State. The cost of support of each able-bodied vagrant is estimated at about 13 cents per day: for the crippled and others unable to work, 17 cents per day.

All persons sentenced to one of the colonies before mentioned are interrogated by the director of the institution as to the causes leading to their sentences, their antecedents, trade, occupation, or profession, whether married or single, &c. Their answers are compared with the report of the judicial proceedings. If the director feels justified in entertaining a hope of a prisoner's redemption and of his going to work in a short time he requests an immediate release from the minister of justice. All prisoners are assigned to sections in accordance with the necessities of each case.

Invalids are divided into three sections :—

(a) Invalids of bad moral character, and all those whose previous conduct justifies a menace to the welfare of others.

(b) The crippled and old, unable to support themselves, but still able to do a certain amount of work.

(c) The infirm, mentally weak, and others absolutely unable to perform any kind of labour.

The able-bodied prisoners are distributed in four sections :—

The first is composed of the immoral, rebellious, and generally vicious, contact with whom might be productive of evil influences. These are isolated in a quarter where they have their workshops, and are constantly under the eyes of a keeper. Each person sleeps by himself in a closed alcove.

The second section is made up of those who are under the surveillance of the police, those who have been reconvicted, and all those of bad conduct.

The third section embraces those who have been previously sentenced, but who behave themselves well.

To the fourth section are assigned all cases of first offence when the culprit has no antecedent record of crime, and has committed no offence more serious than an infraction of police regulations.

The good or bad conduct of the prisoners furnishes the occasion of their transfer from one section to another. Intercourse of any kind between the different sections is prohibited. Each section is provided with its own workshop, sleeping accommodations, yards for exercise, and heaters.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN.

As regards the subdivision of indoor relief, it has been a principal object with the board of guardians, since the latest reorganisation of the poor laws in 1872, to make a clear distinction between the worthy and the unworthy poor, so that those two classes should be completely separated by being assigned to different buildings and subject to different disciplinary regulations. Thus there are at present two large asylums for the reception of the worthy poor of either sex, who from old age, sickness, or other causes are entirely unable to provide for themselves, and who are here very comfortably cared for and fed.

Again, there is an establishment for the worthy poor of either sex who, from slackness in the labour demand or other causes, are temporarily unable to support themselves. There the inmates are employed in workshops in the house or at other work for the establishment, but never outside of the premises; and from their earnings a certain fixed amount is retained and saved up for them so they may have a sum at their disposal on leaving.

Turning next to the unsatisfactory class of unworthy poor, namely, the professional mendicants, vagrants, tramps, &c. These, as before mentioned, may not be consigned to the institutions for the worthy poor, but are assigned to institutions set apart for their class.

FRANCE.

SEINE—INFÉRIEURE.

CONTROL OF VAGRANTS.

The only control ever exercised upon vagrants has been by classification of all paupers as resident and non-resident. Vagrancy is treated as a criminal offence, and prison falls to the lot of the confirmed 'tramp' who lingers by the wayside. There are no accommodations for the tramp other than in a very limited space at the police stations. Almshouses are unknown; a few apartments for the old, feeble, and disabled are attached to the hospitals.

SUPPRESSION OF VAGRANCY.

The penal code provides that any person found begging in a place provided with a public institution, having for its object the prevention of mendicancy, shall be punished with from three to six months' imprisonment, and after the conclusion of his term of imprisonment shall be placed in the workhouse.

Habitual sturdy beggars, found begging in localities where no institution as described above exists, are sentenced to a term of imprisonment varying from one to three months, but if they are arrested outside the limits of the canton where they habitually reside, the sentence will be from six months to two years.

All beggars, even if infirm, who make use of threats, or enter without leave of the owner or occupier within the precincts of any dwelling-house or inclosure, or who feign wounds or infirmities for the purpose of exciting charity, or who go about together (cases of husband and wife, parents and children, and blind man and his conductor excepted), to beg, shall be condemned to a term of imprisonment varying from six months to two years.

GERMANY.

VAGABONDAGE.

In 1873, not less than 300,000 men and boys were living as vagabonds in Germany, begging from town to town, demoralising, and, in many instances, terrifying the rural communities. Not all of these unemployed vagrants were vicious, or even lazy. Many were men who had served through one or both wars, and had been discharged at a time when industries were at a low ebb; they were searching for work that could not be found, and continued failure had entailed suffering and demoralisation.

There was needed, therefore, to complete the system, a further and higher class of retreat, to which the well-disposed unfortunate could go and live respectively while waiting for work or during the seasons when his special kind of labour is impossible—a place, which, while not affording advantages equal to those of regular legitimate employment, will emancipate him from the necessity of a daily tramp, which, if fruitless in finding labour, steadily degrades him to the level of a professional vagrant.

LABOUR COLONIES.

To meet this necessity the latest and most advanced contribution has been made to the German system during the past ten years, in the form of labour colonies (Arbeiter Colonien), of which there are now twenty-four established in various parts of the Empire, the one for the district of Frankfurt being a farm of 140 acres at New Ulrichstein, near Giessen. These colonies are uniformly farms located in quiet, secluded districts, apart from the main thoroughfares of travel, and the temptations of cities and large towns. They are usually established on land which, being originally poor and cheap, requires a large outlay of manual labour for its development. The farm at New Ulrichstein has room for 100 colonists, and is a fair example of its class, although many are much smaller, the one at Madgeburg, for instance, containing only twenty-two beds. But the oldest, largest, and by far the most interesting of these colonies, is the one at Wilhelmsdorf, a few miles from Bielefeld, in northern Westphalia. It is located in the midst of a dreary waste of sand, once the bed of a lake or sea, and so sterile that it had never been cultivated. Here it was found that underlying the sand at a depth of about a yard, there is a stratum of tenacious marl, which, upon exposure to the sun and rain, crumbles into a productive soil. To turn up the ground with pick and spade to a depth of four or five feet, burying the sand and leaving the marl at the surface, is a task which no farmer could afford to do for profit, and which, when done by the voluntary labour of the Arbeiter Colonie, would offer no serious competition to legitimate agriculture.

The colony at Wilhelmsdorf was opened during the summer of 1882, and from that time until 1890, when the latest statistics were published, it had sheltered 5,694 colonists, and provided a little more than 48,000 days of labour, which, among other results, had transformed a large portion of the sterile tract into fertile fields, wherein the vegetables and small fruits consumed by the colonists are grown. Arbeiter colonies are not self-supporting, and do not pretend to be. They require a constant, though moderate, subvention to make their accounts balance, but the amount of this deficit is considered small in proportion to the important role that they play in the work of reform. The net cost of maintaining a colonist, outside of such food as the farm produces, is estimated at 13 cents per day. Wilhelmsdorf has 200 beds, and requires a subvention of 7,500 dollars a year, the collective earnings of the colonists being reckoned at an equal sum.

The conditions of admission and retention are uniform throughout all the colonies, and are substantially as follows:—The colonies not being in any sense penal institutions, admission is purely voluntary. The only penalty which the institution can inflict upon its inmates is that of dismissal. The sojourn of a colonist may be continued two years, on the simple condition of industry and good behaviour. A man may come and go when he pleases; no restriction except the two years' limit of sojourn is imposed. The cost of a colonist's maintenance being 13 cents per day it is assumed that he earns that amount by half a day's labour. During the first two weeks of his stay he must work for simply his food and lodging, but after that, if he labours through the afternoon, he is credited with 13 cents, as the net proceeds of his day's work in excess of his maintenance, which was earned during the forenoon. The colony offers, therefore, small but sure pay for diligent work, it secures to each inmate a permanent home for two years, entirely free from temptation and under Christian influences, for the superintendent of the colony assembles his flock for prayer each morning before leading them to work, and Sunday is a day of rest, worship, and wholesome recreation. The life of a colonist is neither fascinating nor lucrative, but it offers a welcome opportunity to those who wish to escape temptation, retain their self-respect, and regain their footing in the struggle of life. Many men who, among the allurements of the city could never reform, are here so far reclaimed within less than two years, that with the aid of the superintendent they are able to secure employment in good positions, to which they go directly on leaving the colony. The records of Wilhelmsdorf show that in eight years it received 5,637 colonists, of whom only 275 ran away or were dismissed for misconduct, while 5,678 left it to enter positions which they had secured for themselves, or which had been secured for them by the officers of the institution.

The other colonies have been established at various times during the past eight years, and as already indicated, are much smaller than Wilhelmsdorf, their average capacity being not more than one hundred beds. Collectively they had received, down to October, 1891, 40,555 colonists, among whom have been many men of liberal education and more than average abilities, who, through weakness or misfortune, had fallen under the harrow and could not regain their footing without the restraint and support of an Arbeiter Colonie.

Thus far it is conceded by those most competent to judge, that the colonies have supplemented most acceptably the work of the anti-beggary societies, the relief stations, and the Herbergen, by offering a safe and dignified retreat for such of the fallen as have the desire and strength to rise. The precise measure of their permanent effect upon the morals of the community, their efficiency in thoroughly reforming vagrants and reducing crime, is yet to be determined. The colony at Wilhelmsdorf has been in operation ten years under charge of a director of exceptional zeal and ability, so that its results are probably quite above the general average. Some of the other colonies are of comparatively recent foundation, and their work is too immature to furnish a basis of accurate study. Dr. Berthold, who made a careful analysis of the statistics furnished by the colonies which were in operation during the years 1887–88–89, demonstrated that the average results were quite below those which have been above quoted from Wilhelmsdorf. He found that of all the inmates admitted to colonies during those three years, 7.7 per cent. left within the first week, 25.7 per cent. left within a month, 41 per cent. within two months, a per cent. were transferred to public hospitals, 4.4 per cent. were dismissed for misconduct, 2 per cent. ran away, and only 5.5 per cent. remained to the end of the prescribed two years. Of the entire number who left of their own accord, 20.8 per cent., or only one in five, had obtained definite employment elsewhere, the remainder went away because they were weary of a colonist's life, or felt strong enough to resume the struggle on their own account. Many, of course, went back to vagrant lives, but how many cannot be definitely ascertained, and this forms the unknown element in the problem. Naturally the success of the colonies in permanently reforming their inmates must depend largely on their ability to place them in situations which offer permanent and congenial employment, and this must always be governed largely by the prevailing industrial situation and the condition of the labour market. That the vagrant army of 1873 has been reduced to a comparatively small contingent is evident, but how much of this result is due to the Arbeiter Colonien, and how much to the extraordinary development of German industries, which has taken place during the intervening period, would be difficult to determine.

It is this home quality, the atmosphere of personal association and respect, which exerts the most potent influence over a vagrant. The larger the colony, the more official and impersonal its management, the less effective will be its reformatory influence. The record of Wilhelmsdorf may seem to contradict this hypothesis, but Wilhelmsdorf is an exceptional institution, managed by a director of phenomenal zeal and ability, so that its experience does not controvert the general rule. Whether the absolute freedom to come and go at will which has been thus far vouchsafed to all inmates of labour colonies is wisest in practice as it unquestionably is in theory may be regarded doubtful. Berthold found that of the 5,556 colonists who were registered in 1888, 65 per cent. were inmates of a colony for the first time, while 35 per cent. had been there at least once before, and some had been registered four or five times. As a remedy for this restlessness he proposes a period of enforced residence and labour without pay, this period to be lengthened with each successive return of the same person to a colony. This principle has indeed been already adopted at a small branch colony attached to the main institution at Wilhelmsdorf for the special treatment of chronic victims of the drink habit. Admission is voluntary there as elsewhere, but the inmate enters with the understanding that he is to remain long enough to enjoy a reasonable chance of reform, and this obligation he can only evade by running away.

Another important question is whether the colonies themselves should not be graded, so as to sift the colonists, divide them into classes according to character, and by keeping these classes separate enable the worthier ones to receive treatment and opportunities better adapted to their requirements. An experiment in this direction was begun last year in the formation of a home colony at Bremerhaven under the management of Pastor Cronmeyer, who proposes to receive a limited number of especially deserving colonists selected and recommended from the other colonies, each of whom is to be placed on a small piece of ground, which he is to cultivate and gradually purchase with the proceeds of his own labour. If this trial succeeds, the introduction of the grading system among the other colonies is not unlikely to follow, for hitherto the enforced mingling of all sorts and conditions of colonists, the idle and depraved with the industrious and self-respecting, has been found to be one of the radical defects of the system.

SWITZERLAND.

The St Gall laws regulating the giving of charity, the disposition of tramps, drunkards, &c. First as to (bedürftige Durchreisende) tramps:—

(1) Twenty-two stations are established by law throughout the canton where needy tramps may get a dinner or a night's lodging with supper and breakfast.

(2) Assistance in the way of money must not be given at these stations, neither must liquor be dispensed.

(3) The dinner consists of soup and bread, with either cheese or sausage added. Supper and breakfast to consist of bread with either soup or coffee.

(4) No assistance of any kind to be given those who will not perform work when offered them. All such found begging will be turned over to the police for imprisonment without food. Neither will any assistance be given to intoxicated persons.

(5) Every station must also be provided with an intelligence office, to aid tramps with good advice, and to secure employment for them if possible.

(6) Persons who wish to receive meals or lodgings at these stations must be bearers of papers showing permission for the same; they must also have with them a passport, and (Heimatschein) showing in what town they have the rights of citizenship.

(7) Whatever aid is furnished must be carefully indorsed and stamped on one of these papers, and the date, number, &c., be entered in the books of the station.

(8) No tramp can receive meals or lodgings at these stations oftener than once in six months. (They are not free boarding houses, as are many of our Western jails.) The applicant for meals or lodgings must also be able to prove that he has been engaged at work somewhere within the past three months.

(9) These stations are kept under the strict supervision of the canton authorities, to whom exact returns and accounts are made. The expense of keeping them up is borne by the different communes, except a 20 per cent. bonus from the canton and voluntary contributions. The result of this system seems to be that there are comparatively few tramps in the country.

DRUNKARDS.

The legal care of drunkards in this canton.

(1) Persons given to intoxication may be confined in an institution for the healing of drunkards.

(2) They may be kept confined in these institutions nine to eighteen months. In case of return to drunkenness the term in the institution to be prolonged.

(3) Drunkards are confined either by their own request, request of guardians, or by the direction of the commune authorities; but an official medical certificate, showing the man to be a drunkard and the necessity for his confinement as a cure, must be produced.

(4) A guardian may be appointed for the drunkard during his stay in the institution.

(5) The cost for keeping a drunkard in an institution will be collected out of his own property. If he has no property the poor fund will be drawn from and the canton will assist also. An institution or drunkards' cure at Ellikon, on the Thur, accepts patients at the rate of 600 francs a year. The poor pay only 28 cents per day. It has been proven in Switzerland that drunkards can be cured in these institutions, and themselves and families saved from ruin.

APPENDIX XXVI.

MEMORANDUM by Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND.

Extracts from the Recommendations made by the Commissioners appointed in 1891 to inquire into the Prison and Reformatory system of Ontario.

JUVENILE CRIMINALITY.

1. The compulsory establishment of one or more day Industrial Schools in every city and large town for the control and instruction of disorderly or neglected children, of habitual truants, &c.

2. That cities and towns be empowered to pass byelaws forbidding the running at large of boys and girls in the street after dark; such laws to be enforced by the police and truant officers, the parents and guardians being held responsible, unless they are able to show that they cannot control their children.

3. That no child under the age of fourteen be tried in public on any charge, and, if such a child be found guilty, commitment to a jail should not be made, nor should the child be committed to a refuge or reformatory until all other means have been exhausted.

The system of 'suspended sentences' should be taken advantage of unless in cases where the environments are extremely bad.

4. The erection of Industrial Schools in large towns and in grouped districts with good farming land attached for the employment of the inmates who would be detained only so long as may be necessary to render them fit to be placed in a private family either as apprentices or boarders.

5. The cottage system of reformatory is recommended, as also classification, industrial training, the mark system, and moral restraints in substitution for material.

6. All boys to be sent with an 'indeterminate sentence'; remission of the extreme penalty attaching to the offence to be earned by good conduct and industry.

7. A quantity of good land should be attached to a girls' reformatory, so that the girls may be taught farm and dairy work.

8. The moral strength of those reformed to be tested by the adoption of the parole system, apprenticeship, and boarding out in families.

9. On the one hand detention in an Industrial School to be no longer than is necessary for complete reformation, and on the other, none to be allowed to leave unless to return to a good home, or until employment has been found.

DRUNKARDS.

10. Industrial reformatories for inebriates should be erected near cities; the inmates to be employed in farming, market-gardening, and industrial occupations. The cost of the building to be derived from the fees from licensees (which might be temporarily increased for that purpose); the cost of maintenance to be defrayed by the respective municipalities from which the inmates are sent.

11. To this reformatory shall be committed all habitual drunkards who have been previously convicted three times within two years, and such other persons addicted to the use of strong drink, as, in the opinion of the county judge, may be reclaimed by timely restraint and judicious treatment, and those who may be compulsorily committed to an inebriate asylum under the provisions of the Inebriate Act.

The first committal should be for a period of not less than six months, the second not less than one year, and the third for two years. Any inmate, after six months or more, may be permitted to return home on parole, such parole to be granted after due inquiry.

12. The families of inebriates shall receive a portion of the proceeds of their earnings, another portion going to form a fund, out of which those, whose conduct has been good, shall be assisted after leaving the reformatory.

13. If a drunkard be convicted for drunkenness after having been committed a third time to a reformatory, he shall be sent to prison for the full period authorised by law.

TRAMPS AND VAGRANTS.

14. In prison hard labour shall form part of the sentence, and it shall be compulsory on County Councils to provide the stones to be broken or other suitable work.

15. After the second conviction and commitment to a common jail, the tramp or vagrant shall be sentenced to the Central Prison for progressive periods, beginning with not less than six months, to be increased upon a further conviction to the full period authorised by law.

HOMELESS AND DESTITUTE PRISONERS.

16. The abolition of the inhuman system of committing homeless and destitute men, women, and children to common jails, many of whom are, from old age or physical infirmities, incapacitated from earning a living, is urgently recommended, and the establishment of poorhouses made compulsory instead of permissive.

17. It shall be unlawful, when a poorhouse is established in a county, to commit to a common jail as a vagrant any homeless and destitute person who seems to be physically incapable of working.

YOUNG CRIMINALS.

18. An industrial reformatory for this class, which shall incorporate in its methods of treatment all the best features of Elmira, and similar institutions in the United States.

19. To this reformatory shall be committed, for an 'indeterminate' period with a maximum limit, all young men between the ages of seventeen and thirty who have been convicted for the first time for felony or serious misdemeanour, and who, in the opinion of the judges, are suitable cases.

COMMON JAILS—CLASSIFICATION OF PRISONERS.

20. Provided the various classes of prisoners referred to, representing over 50 per cent. of the jail population, be disposed of as recommended, it is quite evident that the means of classifying the other half in common jails would be vastly improved.

LABOUR.

21. 'The contract system,' under which contractors for the payment of a given sum per diem receive the full benefit of such labour, and are given undue control of the prisoners, thereby seriously interfering with the discipline, is condemned, and should not be adopted in any of the penal or reformatory institutions of the province.

The 'piece-price' system, though an improvement on the 'contract' method, is also open to serious objection, as it also too largely vests the control of the prisoners, and of the results of their labour, in contractors, whose only object is good financial results, irrespective of the welfare of the prisoners.

22. In the selection of industries, next to such branches of work as will best afford the means to give good technical instruction to the inmates, preference should be given to the manufacture and production, to the largest possible extent, of all goods required for the public service.

23. Farming is recommended as the best foil for urban youths with hereditary tendencies.

24. Market-gardening and farming are recommended for the inmates of inebriate reformatories. Other industries are recommended for those unfit for farm work.

APPENDIX XXVII.

MEMORANDUM by Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND on the Creation of Special Asylums for Alcoholic Patients in Paris.

Dr. Magnan, of the Asile St Anne, Paris, states that alcoholism properly so-called that is to say, insanity, exclusively toxic, caused 682 patients (559 men and 123 women) to enter St Anne. Of 559 men there were 6 cases of delirium tremens, 238 subacute alcoholism, 308 chronic alcoholism, and 7 cases of absinthism. Nineteen per cent. of the inmates of St Anne were alcoholic cases.

There have also entered a man and a woman suffering from dipsomania, that is to say an irresistible craving for drink, which reproduces itself at indeterminate periods under the form of impulsive paroxysms.

These are real lunatics, but very different from ordinary alcoholics. As Trélat has said: 'Drunkards are people who get drunk when the occasion presents itself; the dipsomaniac is a diseased person who gets drunk every time the craving for drink seizes him.' Besides alcoholics, properly so-called, that is all the intoxicated whose delirium is attributable to the alcoholic poison, and whose place is assigned in a special asylum for alcoholics, we receive a large number of insane, of whom the greater part are degenerate, debilitated, epileptic, and a smaller number of general paralytics in the first stage of the disease, in whom the alcoholic tendency has provoked dangerous excitement, necessitating seclusion.

The establishments for the treatment of drunkards have been for the most part open, receiving only voluntary patients, but the asylum for delirious alcoholics, the only one whose creation is at present realisable in France, ought to be closed like the ordinary asylums; but there is nothing to prevent agricultural or other work outside the walls of the asylum.

There is also no reason why a little more liberty should not be allowed daily to patients on the way to recovery, and even to give freedom to patients who would seem to be firmly resolved to remain abstinent. Besides, the delirious alcoholics who, without much prospect of a definite cure, inhabit our asylums to-day, the special alcoholic asylums could receive the drunkards, of whom there is a considerable number, and whose hypochondriacal tendencies and state of depression, without constituting delirium, properly so-called, create a mental condition bordering on insanity.

These patients who refuse to be placed in an asylum in spite of their strong desire to break with habits of intemperance, would often make no difficulty in seeking admission to a special retreat for alcoholics. These drunkards, wishing to be cured, would not be a cause of trouble, and would submit with docility to the discipline and régime of the alcoholic asylums, as they do elsewhere in the houses of treatment for drunkards. The same would hold good for the victims of cocaine, morphia, and ether.

In short, this special asylum, once installed, would perhaps, by an administrative measure, be able to receive from the prison, which had been of little benefit to them, such recidivists as are condemned for public drunkenness.

On quitting the bureau of admission the alcoholic males are passed on to the asylum at Ville Evrard, where a special part, conducted on abstinence principles, is reserved for them; as for the women they are sent to Villejuif to a department specially organised for them.

At Villejuif all will probably go well, but there is no disguising the difficulties which will have to be overcome at Ville Evrard, in order to preserve intact a small company of abstainers in the midst of a large number of intemperants scattered throughout the asylum.

The special alcoholic asylum in the department of the Seine is destined to render great service if, as one might reasonably hope, it would yield a third of definite cures.

The Report, from which these Extracts have been taken, comes up for discussion in Paris in January before the Conseil Supérieur de l'Assistance Publique.

APPENDIX XXVIII.

EXTRACTS from MEMORANDUM by the Rev. A. J. B. BAXTER, Chaplain to H.M. General Prison, Perth.

So far as concerns habitual offenders, chargeable with trivial offences (of course trivial in a legal sense), such as being drunk and incapable, it would be an improvement to introduce a system of suspended sentences. It would work in this way that when the first sentence is pronounced, the culprit would be liberated, and the same procedure would take place, until the total of the sentences reached a few months, when this lengthened period of imprisonment would be undergone at once, instead of in dribbles as at present. This would suit either the sentences now given or those awarded under a cumulative system.

A part of all convict sentences (one-fourth for men and one-third for women), is at present suspended, if certain conditions are met; and the above proposal would only have the effect of extending to the whole of a sentence, what is, in the cases cited, already done with a part.

Tramps, tinkers, and the whole of the wandering tribes might be placed under the County Councils to regulate their movements and to enforce arrangements for their being housed and cared for under sanitary conditions.

APPENDIX XXIX.

MEMORANDUM by Dr. J. F. SUTHERLAND, on the 'Intermediate Prison' System, at Lusk and Smithfield, Ireland.

The author of this system was Sir Walter Crofton, Chairman of the Irish Prison Board. In his somewhat novel scheme of convict discipline he had the full and warm support of the Lord-Lieutenant of the day, the late Earl of Carlisle. The two chief features of the system were 'individualisation' and 'intermediate prisons.'

Isolation formed the first stage of discipline, and it was undergone in two cellular prisons at Dublin—one for men, the other for women. The discipline in the women's prison, the inmates of which were upwards of 400, was somewhat complex, and every stage of discipline was passed through there.

A version of the mark system constituted the moral machinery of the establishment. The convict rose through a scale of promotion by a dint of her own industry and good conduct. The discipline began in the cell and ended in the 'exemplary' class, and at each remove she obtained an increase of privileges.

The reward to the industrious and well-behaved was something better than a mere premature dismissal. The convict was admitted, under a ticket-of-leave, into a 'Refuge' or Retreat. To enter the refuge was the condition of her release, and the managers were armed with legal power for her detention. For this privilege all the women, except the baser sort, worked eagerly; but, as many were lacking in self-control and perseverance, not more than 50 per cent. accomplished their purpose. In the two refuges—one Protestant and the other Catholic—the individualisation, which, in the routine of the prison, could not be but imperfectly attempted, was thoroughly accomplished, and the urgent need of it was constantly demonstrated.

The refuge often succeeded when the prison failed.

A home and employment was, if possible, found for every woman when the time came for absolute freedom.

The prison for men was entirely on the 'separate' system, the regulation term, prescribed by the Home Office, was nine months for all alike. Something was done at Mountjoy to correct this mistake, by allowing the prisoner to shorten cellular confinement a month earlier by good conduct and industry. A hard and fast line was not acted upon, and no convict was removed from the cell until the full benefit of separate treatment was gained.

On leaving Mountjoy the convict, if a labourer, was sent to the public works on Spike Island; if a mechanic, to another prison where trades were carried on. A scale of classes, and a scheme of marks, formed the framework of the discipline. Marks were given on three grounds. There were four classes—the third, the second, the first, and the advanced, and a fixed number of marks had to be made up in each before admission into the 'intermediate prison.' A seven years' convict who came from Mountjoy with an 'exemplary' character required to remain two months in the third class, six in the second, twelve in the first, and twenty in the advanced. Altogether, then, counting the eight months at Mountjoy, he passed at least four years out of the seven in the ordinary before he was admissible into the 'intermediate prison.'

There was a class below the third, the probation class—intended chiefly for those unfit for separate confinement—who never resided at Mountjoy.

Each remove brought some change of dress, till, at last, in the advanced class, the prison garb was discarded entirely. The earnings ranged from a 1d. a week in the third class, to 9d. in the advanced, and these accumulated till their discharge. But, with regard to their moral training, the most important feature in the classes was the gradual relaxation of restraint. The convict's right to self-government was restored to him by degrees.

When the Spike Island men reached the advanced class, they were transferred to two ports, really intermediate prisons, at the mouth of Cork harbour, where, under little or no supervision, and surrounded by many of the temptations of ordinary life, they found themselves with hardly a vestige of the moral go-cart left to lean on. This ordeal was looked upon as an almost sure test of reformation, and an admirable means of perfecting their training. But it was to the prison factory at Smithfield in Dublin, and to the prison farm on Lusk Common, fifteen miles from Dublin, that the name of 'intermediate prisons' properly belonged. The mechanics were drafted into the one, the labourers into the other.

At Lusk forty convicts were employed in the cultivation of waste lands. They lodged in two iron huts, each costing £330, and easily removable in case they should be wanted elsewhere. There was nothing suggestive of the prison about the place. There was one key, what the French would term la clef des champs. Their dress was that of ordinary labourers. At Smithfield, too, there was the same absence of all durance, all prison accessories, and all physical restraint. Moral checks were found to be more effectual than bars and bolts. The convicts worked their way into the 'intermediate prison' at the cost of great toil and perseverance, and by any breach of trust they would have forfeited all the results of their labour. While the attractions of their last resting-place were scanty, all that was merely penal in their past discipline was removed.

Smithfield and Lusk, in some measure, anticipated Elmira (U.S.) by fifteen years. The school-room was transformed into a lecture-room, and the school-master into a lecturer. He made them think, debate, and study for themselves. Their labour was hard, and so was their fare. The bulk of the earnings was devoted to defray a very considerable part of the cost. Half-a-crown a week was the most he could receive for himself, 6d. of that being for pocketmoney. The life was not exactly what a quondam felon would have adopted from choice, but he had a character to lose.

A penal sentence of three years meant four months' residence; fifteen, two years, and he could not leave until an employer was found for him. In reality the 'intermediate prison' served as a moral sieve to catch the bad, and to let the good pass through. The convict was exposed to the temptations of ordinary life. He was trusted, went errands, and made purchases. His fate was in his own hands. The subsequent conduct of every liberate who remained in Ireland could be ascertained almost to a certainty, till the expiry of his licence, and as the ticket-holder had to report himself once a month to the police authorities, &c., his future was, as far as possible, carefully watched for a time.

Fair-minded critics considered the system highly satisfactory. In 1854 there were 3933 in the prisons, in 1861, 1492. In 1854, 710 were sentenced to penal servitude; in 1861, 331. Although the conditions of the licences were stringently enforced, not more than seven in a hundred were revoked.

The report of the Irish Convict Prisons for the period show that eight-ninths of the convicts worked their way into the intermediate prisons; the other ninth who remained in the ordinary prisons, till the expiration of their sentences set them free, furnished most of the relapses. Sir Walter Crofton went on the principle that convicts should be treated individually rather than in mass, and the remissible portion of the sentence, and other inducements, gave them the necessary stimuli, and thus the discipline was worked with a strong motive power.

The Irish system has passed through many changes. The works on the fortifications in Cork harbour and elsewhere have ceased. The intermediate prison at Lusk, when the number of convicts dwindled to 25 was closed. The English and Scotch convict systems as they now are, show, not that the Irish system has been a failure, but that the English and Scotch have been vastly improved by the adoption of many of the most valuable of the principles of prison management, long regarded as distinctively Irish.

The Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons says "without condemning the intermediate system," we are of opinion that it is impossible to recommend the continuance of Lusk. The Chairman of the Irish Prison Board—Mr Bourke—condemned as strongly as the Vice-Chairman, Sir John Lentaigne, justified its existence.

APPENDIX XXX.

MEMORANDUM relative to Evidence of Mr. R. P. LAMOND.

The ancient Scottish process of interdiction was connected with the branch of the law called curatory or guardianship. The process was both voluntary and judicial, and was designed to protect persons of facile and improvident habits from their own profuseness and prodigality. Judicial or compulsory interdiction was imposed by sentence of the Court of Session in a suit brought by a near kinsman of the party, or it might be imposed by the Court in exercise of its nobile officium. The interdiction had to be published within the jurisdiction where the interdicted person resided, and thereafter to be registered both in the books of that jurisdiction and of that within which the person's lands lay. The object of the process was to secure the heritable estate of the person interdicted from alienation to his prejudice. This was accomplished by the decree declaring that no conveyances granted without consent of the persons named in the decree, called interdictors, were valid; and by providing that all deeds granted without such consent should be liable to be set aside or reduced, an action which was competent not only to the heirs of the interdicted person, but to the interdictors, and to the interdicted person himself, if he sued with consent of the interdictors. But this inhibition did not strike at onerous or rational deeds granted by the person, even without consent of the interdictors.

See Scots Act, 1681, cap. 119; Stair's Institutions, book i., title vi., sects. 38, 39; Erskine's Principles, Guthrie's edition, book i., lib. vii., sect. 30, in which detailed accounts of this process will be found. This remedy fell into desuetude towards the end of the last century, since which time it has been superseded in practice by voluntary trusts.

The process was a survival from the Roman jurisprudence—By the law of the Twelve Tables madmen and prodigals although past the age of 25—that of legal majority—were placed under the curatorship of their ag nati,—i.e., relatives on the father's side. But, ordinarily, and after inquiry into the circumstances of the case, curators were appointed to them,—at Rome by the praetor, and in the provinces by the praeses. These curators had charge of the person as well as of the estate of the furiosi et prodigi. These persons might grant deeds and make alienations without consent of their curators; but, unless the curator consented to them, the praetor would always interpose, and relieve the granters from consequences that were prejudicial,—so, in effect, persons under this species of guardianship were not really bound, unless their curators consented to their deeds.

See the Institutes, book i., title xxiii., sects. 3, 4.

Examples of similar protective legal process are to be found in the juridical systems of those States which took for their basis the Roman law. Thus, e.g.—

I. FRANCE.

By the Code Napoleon, book i., title xi., chap. ii., sect. 489, persons of full age, who are in an habitual state of imbecility, insanity, or madness, can be interdicted even where such state presents lucid intervals. The process may be set in motion by kindred against kindred, and by husband or wife against each other. Every demand for interdiction has to be brought before the tribunal, and the acts of imbecility, etc., founded on are to be set forth one by one in writing, and the parties promoting the interdiction are to produce the witnesses and documents. The accused person is cited for his interest, and has to be interrogated by the magistrate, who, after such examination, if there appear to be ground for it, shall commission a provisional administrator to take charge both of the person and of the estate of the defendant. Judgment upon demand of interdiction is not to be given, save at a public hearing, the parties having been heard or summoned. The decree of interdiction has to be formally notified to the party, and published in the court hall and in the notaries' offices of the jurisdiction. If the decree of first instance is not appealed from, or, if appealed from, it is confirmed, the office of interim administrator is superseded by the appointment of a guardian. Acts and deeds done and granted subsequent to the interdiction without consent of the adviser are null.

Interdicted persons are in the same situation as to their person and property as minors, and the laws relating to guardians and minors apply to the guardianship of interdicted persons. Section 510 provides that:—'The revenues of an interdicted person ought essentially to be applied in soothing their situation and accelerating their cure. According to the nature of his malady and the state of his fortune, the family council may order that he may be taken care of in his domicile, or be placed in a house of health, or even in an hospital; and by section 512 it is enacted:—'Interdiction ceases with the causes on which it was founded; nevertheless the taking off of the interdiction shall be pronounced with the formalities prescribed for obtaining it; and no interdicted person can resume the exercise of his rights until after judgment pronouncing the taking off.'

II. AUSTRIA.

By the General Code of the Austrian Monarchy (See De Winiwarter's Translation, 1856), Part. 1, Ch. 4. Minute provisions based on much the same lines as those of the Code Napoleon, are made for the appointment of guardians to persons under all sorts of disabilities—a guardianship which controls the person, as well as the estate.

It is unnecessary to quote largely from these. But these laws provide for especial protection by means of a guardian or curator of those who are incapable for other reasons besides those of minority, or want of a father of managing their affairs (sect. 187). And, while the guardian is bound chiefly to care for the person of such, he is also appointed for the management of their affairs (sect. 188). Section 190 provides:—'The tribunal must, as soon as it is informed of it, proceed ex officio to the appointment of a suitable guardian.' The process is known by the term of judicial interdiction. Section 273 is relevant. It provides:—'Only those can be considered as mad or idiots who have judicially been declared so, after a strict examination of their behaviour, and after hearing the opinion of the physicians nominated for this purpose by the tribunal. Such persons must be declared by the tribunal as dissipated, who, it is apparent from the information given, and the examination which has taken place in consequence, spend their money in an inconsiderate manner, and who expose themselves or their family to future want by wanton borrowing, concluded under ruinous conditions. In both cases the judicial declaration must be publicly proclaimed.' Also section 283, which enacts:—'The committee ceases as soon as the matters entrusted to the curator are finished, or when the reasons which have prevented the person under committee administering his own affairs cease. Whether . . . the will of a dissipated person has improved thoroughly and lastingly must be decided after a strict examination of the circumstances by continuous experience, and in the first case at the same time from the certificates of the physicians appointed by the tribunal for the examination.'

Reference may further be made on this subject to the authorities collected in Par's International Law, 2nd edition, Gillespie's translation, 1892, book iv., 'Status and Capacity,' sect. 152.

Restrictions on Liberation,	20 and 21 Vict. c. 71, s. 93. 20 and 21 Vict. c. 71, s. 89, 93.
Provision for case of prisoners becoming insane,	25 and 26 Vict. c. 54, s. 19, 22, 23. 34 and 35 Vict. c. 55, s. 6.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Case of persons entering Asylums voluntarily,	29 and 30 Vict. c. 51, s. 15.
Licences for Institutions for Imbecile Children,	25 and 26 Vict. c. 54, s. 7.

* An Act to make further provision respecting Lunacy in Scotland, 25 and 26 Vict. c. 54, sect. xv.
The 86th sect. of the first recited Act (20 and 21 Vict. c. 71) is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof, when any Lunatic shall have been apprehended, charged with assault or other offence inferring danger to the peace, or when any Lunatic shall be found in a state threatening danger to the peace, or in a state offensive to public decency, it shall be lawful for the Sheriff of the County within which such Lunatic may have been apprehended or found, on application by the Procurator-Fiscal, or Inspector of the Poor or other person, accompanied by a certificate from a medical person bearing that the Lunatic is in a state threatening such danger or in a state offensive or threatening to be offensive to public decency, forthwith to commit such Lunatic to some place of safe custody: And the Sheriff shall thereupon direct notice to be given in some newspaper, and to the Inspector of Poor where he is not the applicant, and such further notice as he shall think fit; and if the Inspector of Poor does not within 24 hours undertake to the satisfaction of the Sheriff to make due arrangements for the safe custody of the Lunatic, the Sheriff shall take evidence, and if satisfied, commit to an Asylum until cured or until caution be found for his safe custody—in which last case Sheriff may authorise delivery of Lunatic to person finding caution: And Sheriff shall have power to grant decree for expenses of inquiry and of maintenance in Asylum against Inspector of Poor, whose right of relief against Lunatic, his estate and relatives legally liable is reserved.

APPENDIX XXXII.

ASSOCIATION FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE, GLASGOW.REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE ON PETTY OFFENDERS AND VAGRANTS.

The Sub-Committee think that any action in regard to vagrancy should be deferred until the matters remitted to the Sub-Committee on labour centres have been practically dealt with: and, meanwhile, the Sub-Committee are collecting information, with a view to future action.

In regard to Petty Criminal Offences, the Sub-Committee recommend:

(a) As to Juvenile Offenders:

That the reforming influence of existing agencies should be more fully taken advantage of than at present, and that this should, as far as possible, be accomplished without attaching any stigma to the young persons affected. With this object they suggest:—

1. That a measure proceeding on the lines of The Glasgow Juvenile Delinquency Prevention and Repression Act, 1878, should be made applicable to the whole of Scotland; and that the powers conferred by that Act, as well as by the General Reformatory and Industrial Schools Acts, should be amplified in the matter of withdrawing children wholly or partially from the influence and control of unworthy parents, or other persons acting as guardians. It is believed that the Day Industrial School system is most valuable, as securing for the children in many cases a strict discipline and healthy upbringing, without absolutely breaking the family tie.
2. That no child under 12 years of age should, in any case, be imprisoned for a petty offence; and that where a child is sentenced by a magistrate to be sent to a Reformatory or Industrial School, such child should not be previously sent to prison.
3. That the powers conferred on Sheriffs and Magistrates by the Lord Advocate's regulations, in regard to the birching of juvenile male offenders, should be more fully taken advantage of in dealing with boys who are not to be sent to Reformatories or Industrial Schools.

The Sub-Committee are of opinion that voluntary institutions, for the upbringing and education of children otherwise unprovided for, might be taken advantage of in this connection. Although it might not be practicable that the magistrates should directly commit an offender to such an institution, they might be allowed a discretion to refrain from committing the young persons brought before them to a reformatory or industrial school, provided these persons be received into a voluntary institution (where their religious belief would be safeguarded and conduct themselves with propriety therein).

(b) As to Adults:

The great majority of such petty offenders are convicted as being 'drunk and incapable,' or 'riotous and disorderly,' or otherwise for offences directly attributable to drink, and a large proportion of these are 'habitual' offenders. The present system of dealing with this class is, in the opinion of the Sub-Committee, productive of much harm, and the Sub-Committee recommend:—

1. That a system of cumulative or progressive sentences should be adopted and rigidly enforced.
2. That after six convictions have been obtained against the same person within twelve months, or after twenty convictions spread over any period, the offender should be declared a 'habitual drunkard,' and should be committed to an Inebriate Home, or otherwise boarded out, under suitable conditions as to health, diet, and industry.
3. That a vigorous effort should be made to enforce, and if necessary amend, the law as to supplying liquor to persons in a state of intoxication; and that the supplying of liquor to persons who have, to the knowledge of the publican, been declared 'habitual drunkards' should be made punishable as an offence under the Licensing Laws.

If a farm colony should be established, as recommended by the Sub-Committee on labour centres, this might with much advantage be utilised in dealing with certain classes of inebriates.

On the other hand, it would appear that Perth penitentiary is only occupied to the extent of one-third of its capacity, while the poorhouses throughout the country are only half filled. It is thought that some of these institutions might be turned to account in dealing with different grades of these habitual drunkards, by being set apart for their separate use.

Perhaps this Sub-Committee have not, strictly speaking, to deal with the numerous victims to drink in all classes of society whose cases do not come before the police courts. They very earnestly sympathise in the efforts that are being made, by which, independently of any conviction, the relatives and friends of a person addicted to drunkenness may be enabled to subject the patient (even without his or her consent) to restraint and treatment for a suitable length of time. They admit the difficulty of the subject, but they are satisfied it must immediately be dealt with in the interests of society at large.

The Sub-Committee approve of the efforts which are being put forth in various quarters to make the prison punishment serve also as a reformatory discipline; but it may be said that this matter does not specially pertain to the class of offenders with which this Sub-Committee have to deal.

The Sub-Committee have had under consideration the matter of advising and aiding discharged prisoners—a subject, in their opinion, of vital importance—but they make no specific recommendation at present as to this. They believe that an immense amount of good might be accomplished by fostering the voluntary agencies already at work in this direction, and by bringing these into touch with the labour centres proposed by the Sub-Committee dealing with that matter.

On behalf of the Committee,

JOHN Y. KING,
J. F. SUTHERLAND,
Joint Conveners.

APPENDIX XXXIII.

Habitual Offenders Scotland (1866), presented by the Lord Rossie.

A BILL INTITULED AN ACT FOR THE BETTER PREVENTION OF CERTAIN OFFENCES IN SCOTLAND.

Whereas the laws now in force in Scotland are insufficient for the prevention of certain offences:

Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

1. This Act may be cited as the Habitual Offenders (Scotland) Act, 1866.

2. The term 'offence' means the offences following, in so far as persons charged with such offences, or any of them, might have been competently tried before any magistrate or justice if this Act had not been passed; that is to say, being drunk and disorderly, committing a breach of the peace, the being guilty of assault with breach of the peace, or of riotous or disorderly conduct causing or tending to cause a breach of the peace.

The term 'offender' means any person convicted of or charged with committing an offence.

The term 'habitual offender' means an offender who has been convicted of an offence or more times during the years immediately preceding the date of the Commission or alleged Commission of another offence charged, or who has been once or more than once convicted before the sheriff under this Act.

The term 'magistrate' means any person or persons having jurisdiction in the trial of an offender within any royal burgh, or extended or parliamentary or other boundaries thereof, or within any police limits, or burgh of barony or regality, under or in virtue of any Act of Parliament, Grant, Royal Charter, Custom, or otherwise.

The term 'justice' means any justice or justices of the peace acting in Scotland.

The term 'sheriff' includes sheriff-substitute.

3. Every habitual offender charged with committing another offence shall be tried by the sheriff of the county within which the offence charged is alleged to have been committed, and with or without a jury, as may be directed in due course of law, and upon conviction such habitual offender shall be imprisoned for any term not exceeding calendar months, with or without hard labour; and on the expiration of such period he shall further find surety by bond of caution, himself in ten pounds, and two sureties in five pounds each, or one surety in ten pounds, in every case to the satisfaction of the sheriff, for his not committing another offence for the space of one year next following, and in case of not finding such sureties he shall be further imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for the space of six calendar months, unless such sureties are sooner found: provided always, that in lieu of imprisonment the sheriff may, in his discretion, impose on an habitual offender a fine not exceeding ten pounds, with power to order him to be imprisoned and kept at hard labour for the space of six calendar months unless such fine be sooner paid; but the exercise of such discretion shall not in such case permit the sheriff to dispense with a like bond of caution with sureties for such habitual offender not committing another offence.

4. When any fine shall be imposed under this Act the same shall be applied and paid over to the like uses and purposes as if the party liable therein had been tried and convicted for the same offence, and a fine imposed, by a magistrate or justice.

5. Whenever an habitual offender shall be brought before a magistrate or justice charged with having committed an offence, such magistrate or justice shall take the evidence of the previous convictions only, and on the same being proved to his satisfaction he shall forthwith, and without further procedure, remit the case to the procurator fiscal for the county within which the particular offence charged was alleged to have been committed, together with a certificate under the hand of the clerk of court that such previous conviction had been so proved, which certificate shall be final and conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated in all future proceedings before the sheriff for the trial of such habitual offenders.

6. Whenever in the trial of any person alleged to be an habitual offender, which shall have originated before the sheriff, there shall be a failure to prove the previous convictions to the extent required to make such person an habitual offender within the meaning of this Act, it shall nevertheless be lawful for the sheriff, on such person being convicted of the particular offence charged, to award such punishment as he might have awarded had no such aggravation been charged.

7. This Act shall apply to Scotland only.

8. This Act shall commence on and be in force from and after the day of August one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

APPENDIX XXXIV.

To the Chairman of the Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders.

CHILDREN'S SHELTER, 142 High Street,
EDINBURGH, 30th November 1894.

SIR,—I now beg to submit the figures and further information asked for by the members of your Committee, when the representatives of this Society gave evidence before the Committee. I would beg leave to explain that I had not these figures with me, owing to my absence in London until the very morning of my appearance before the Committee.

Mortality at Corstorphine Home.

During the last three years there have been from 90 to 100 children continually in this Home, and during that period three have died. The health of the children has been remarkably good.

Custody Orders.

Out of 59 cases against fathers for neglecting and ill-treating their children during the last three years, in only four instances was application made for a Custody Order. In the first case, the man's earnings were £1, 10s. per week, and 10s. per week are deducted by his employer from his wages for board for his four children, who, at the instance of the Society, were sent to the Smyllum Orphanage, the man being a Roman Catholic. In the second case the father of the child is a tramp, and nothing can be recovered. In the third case a Custody Order was asked for in the name of a relation of the child, and we understand the father is paying board. In the fourth case we are able to get from the father occasional payments.

In the vast majority of cases in which a Custody Order is applied for under the Act for protection of Children, it is on account of the unfitness of mothers to look after their children.

Average Wage of Fathers.

Of the 59 cases against fathers in the last three years, their weekly wage averaged £1, 5s. 11½d. This is considerably less than that stated by me, namely, 33s. The difference is accounted for by the fact that many of the fathers were at the time of prosecution either out of work or only earning a very small wage.

Children sent to Industrial Schools.

During the past three years 137 children have been sent to Industrial Schools at the instance of the Officers of the Society in Edinburgh, and only in the case of 27 of these children had the parents been prosecuted for neglect. All the others may be taken to belong to the Vagrant Class, the children having been found wandering without proper guardians.

Vagrancy.

It is true as stated by our Law Agent in his evidence that comparatively few of those who are prosecuted under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act for neglecting their children, are of the Vagrancy Class. The Society has, and it is still dealing with a large number of that class by preventing them exposing their children in the streets, either singing or begging, and we believe if the Society had sufficient support from the public to enable it to place an officer in all the rural districts as well as cities and towns in Scotland, the exposing of children so as to incite alms-giving could be put down, and vagrancy in consequence much reduced, as these beggars would, in the majority of cases, not find it profitable to beg if they were not allowed to have their children with them.

I fear I did not make my meaning clear in reply to your question as to my statement regarding the Society not being a charitable one.

We take up the position that the object of the Society is to, as far as possible, enforce upon parents their responsibilities to their children, and to carry out the present law regarding the prevention of cruelty to children in conjunction with the police. Our cordial relationship with the police all over the country points to the necessity of such an adjunct as our Society to the police. I would specially refer you to a letter from the Chief Constable of Ayr which you will find printed on page 91 of The Children's Guardian sent herewith.

The experience of the Society goes to convince the Directors that the laws relating to the protection of children, as at present, are sufficient to deal with offenders if they were more stringently carried out, and more severe sentences were imposed.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

J. MACDONALD,
Hon. Secy.

APPENDIX XXXV.

MEMORANDUM by Mr. MALCOLM M'NEILL,
Secretary of the Local Government Board.

Custody of Children.

So long as the parent remains a pauper, the Parochial Board are entitled to make such arrangements as they think necessary both for him and for his children, but they could probably not insist on his surrendering the care of them while outdoor relief is granted to him.

If he enters the Poorhouse, however, it is open to the Parochial Board to retain him there and to board out the children; he may insist on his discharge at any time, on twenty-four hours' notice, and, ceasing to be a pauper, may demand custody of his children.

The above assumes that no proceedings have been taken under the Act for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

APPENDIX XXXVI.

POOR LAW REPORTS by VISITING OFFICER of Parish of Selkirk.

25th October 1889.

Parish of Selkirk.

The books appear in order, but No. 264 on the roll seems a questionable case for outdoor relief.

It appears to me that the keeping up of a shelter house in this town out of the poor rates, and the giving of a night's shelter to all and sundry who apply, is open to serious objection. The police, I understand, give tickets for admission to many who are able-bodied, and who are in no way destitute. This system cannot but tend to encourage vagrancy.

GEORGE FALCONAR-STEWART,
Visiting Officer.

24th January 1891.

The books appear in order, but No. 264 on the roll seems a doubtful case for outdoor relief.

The Parochial Board of this parish are, in my opinion, carrying on a system of granting indiscriminate relief to vagrants, much to the injury of this class, and against all principles of sound Poor Law administration. The following are the numbers given relief within the shelter house in the years 1889-90 :—

For the half-year ending 26th June 1889, 771 men, 93 women, 71 children.

For the half year ending 25th December 1889, 546 men, 69 women, 47 children.

For the half-year ending 25th June 1890, 620 men, 58 women, 38 children.

For the half-year ending 31st December 1890, 510 men, 65 women, 39 children.

The average cost per head is 3s. 4d., exclusive of caretaker, rent of building, and coal. This sum, I understand, only covers cost of food and soup.

Few, if any, of these persons pass through the hands of the Inspector of Poor, and consequently there is no proper check as to whether the applicants are proper objects for relief or not. It may be assumed that a large proportion are able-bodied, and consequently not entitled to relief out of the poor rates, which is all the more reason why the cases should be dealt with by the Inspector, who has the opportunity of carefully inquiring into each case, and can claim the assistance of the medical officer to examine individuals, and thus check imposture. If all parishes in Scotland were to adopt this generous treatment of casuals, we should have a lamentable increase of vagrancy. Of late years most Inspectors have conscientiously endeavoured to check this growing evil, and have met with considerable success, and it does appear a pity that the authorities here should take retrogressive instead of progressive steps, when there appears no special reason for exceptional treatment.

GEORGE FALCONAR-STEWART,
Visiting Officer.

EXTRACT from REPORTS by Mr. G. FALCONAR-STEWART, General Superintendent of Poor.

28th January 1889.

Parish of Galashiels.

The system adopted in this parish, and the parish of Melrose, of upkeeping a shelter house at a cost last year of £29, 15s. 2d., divided equally between both parishes, seems open to serious objection.

All applicants are granted by the caretaker, a night's shelter, and a meal morning and evening during winter, and a meal in the morning in summer. There would appear to be no check upon the class who frequent the building, or any proper inquiry made as to whether or not they are really destitute. These applications are not made to the Inspector direct.

From May 1887 to May 1888, 3371 adults and dependants were given shelter. Nothing could tend more to demoralise the vagrant class than this indiscriminate dispensing of relief.

The actual expenditure incurred by the Inspector, on account of applications received by him personally, amounted only to £5, 7s. 4d., and this was only on account of cases awaiting the decision of the Parochial Board.

13th March 1891.

I cannot too strongly urge upon the Parochial Board the discontinuance, as soon as possible, of their system of dealing with vagrants. The Parochial Board may rest assured that if the practice of giving 6d. to every applicant who may be in want of a night's shelter be continued, the burgh will speedily become infested with vagrants.

14th August 1889.

Parish of Hawick.

A shelter house is kept by the burgh, parish of Hawick, and the parish of Wilton, where tramps have been lodged for many years past, but no record of the applications is kept. In fact every one who applies to the caretaker is granted a night's shelter. I cannot but consider this plan very detrimental to all concerned.

24th January 1891.

Parish of Jedburgh.

I commend to the attention of the Inspector, the Board's circulars of 17th March 1869 and 12th April 1887, as to the vagrant class.

The system adopted in this parish of maintaining a shelter house, under control of the police, wherein tramps and others are given a night's shelter, independent of their being proper objects of relief or not, is open to serious objection.

Any place of the kind which is maintained out of the poor-rates, should be under the control of the Inspector, and all applications should be considered by him, and passed through the record of applications.

23rd September 1891.

I have made further inquiries into the manner in which the vagrant class is dealt with in this parish, and the opinion I expressed in my report, of date 24th January 1891, that the management of this class is defective is further confirmed.

The Parochial Board, in their Minute of 22nd June, are under a misapprehension in assuming that I ever took exception to the establishment of a shelter house—far from it, I consider every parish, more especially the ones which have towns within their limits, should be in possession of such a place.

What I take exception to is the indiscriminate relief given to all and sundry. Under existing arrangements application is made to the police, who grant orders on the caretaker to all, except those alleging illness, or those intoxicated. The former are sent on to the Inspector to be dealt with, and the latter refused.

The result is that almost every night some vagrants are given a night's shelter. A meal is also given in the morning. The expense of maintaining the shelter house and the inmates is, for year ending 15th May 1891, £14, 14s. 10d. The Parochial Board shelter themselves under the belief that their present system works satisfactorily, and that no criticism has been offered since 1882.

I have frequently drawn attention to what I consider this irregularity to the late Inspector, but always found great difficulty in convincing him of the illegality of his practice.

Now that a new Inspector has taken up duty, I venture upon criticism in the hope that a remedy may be found. The police have no statutory duties, under the Poor Law Act, to administer relief by offering them a night's shelter. The only official entrusted with this responsibility is the Inspector.

Every applicant for relief should approach the Inspector, and let him deal with the case as the circumstances require.

It must be borne in mind that vagrants are further relieved by the Inspector in small sums of money, amounting in the year to £8, 4s. 4d.

In no well-regulated parish is money ever given, and the Inspector must bear in mind that these payments in no way relieve him from responsibility, as any proper object of relief is entitled to food, shelter, &c.

I commend to the attention of the Inspector a careful study of the Board's circulars, pages 92-96, in Rules and Regulations, 1890.

APPENDIX XXXVII.

MEMORANDUM on the Employment of Women (incompetent and degraded) in various branches of Agriculture, by R. PATRICK WRIGHT, F.H.A.S., Professor of Agriculture.

The branches of Agriculture in which the labour of women can be most fitly employed are—

- (1.) Poultry and bee-keeping.
- (2.) Dairying.
- (3.) Market gardening.

1. Poultry-keeping by itself is suitable solely because it consists of light work that can be undertaken by persons of small physical strength. For the purposes of providing employment, the chief objection is that only a few attendants are required for a pretty large poultry farm. It is also not, as a rule, a profitable branch of farming.

For the purpose of employing the largest number of attendants, the most suitable kind of poultry farm would be one devoted to the fattening, killing, and preparing poultry for the market.

On 10 acres of land there would be accommodation for 2000 fowls. The capital required for fowls, pens, appliances, food, and working expenses, would be from £500 to £600. Such a farm would give employment to ten strong and competent women, and, therefore, to thirty or forty weak and incompetent. There would most likely be an annual deficit.

Dairying.

2. Dairying might be, as it usually is, associated with farming, in which case the labour of men would also be required.

Work, however, might be provided for women in town dairies, or dairies adjacent to towns, apart from ordinary agriculture, the food for the cows being purchased and delivered at the byres.

One strong and vigorous woman is capable of feeding, cleaning, milking, and making the butter of ten cows. Probably five or six incompetent women could be kept sufficiently occupied with the same number.

If the buildings were rented, the total capital required would be from £20 to £25 per cow.

If a good retail trade for milk were established, the dairy might possibly be self-supporting; otherwise there would be a deficit.

Market Gardening.

3. This is the most suitable of all branches of farm work for the employment of women, in respect that a much larger number can be engaged in it than in any other, and that it gives a more remunerative return. Most of the work, such as weeding, pruning, fruit pulling, vegetable gathering, &c., is specially suitable for women; and it is only in respect to the heavier work of deep digging that they are less competent than men. This difficulty could, however, be overcome. The most serious difficulty would > be the provision of work during the winter months, when far fewer hands are required in a market garden than in summer, but they could be employed in repeated light digging, and in frosty weather some indoor occupation might have to be provided.

Ten persons—men and women—can be kept employed on 10 acres of land. Probably 40 or 50 incompetent women could do the same work.

The capital required—apart from house accommodation—would be £20 per acre.

Under skilful management, market gardening might probably be able to maintain its workers and to pay its way.

APPENDIX XXXVIII.

Re VAGRANTS, HABITUAL OFFENDERS, &c.

CHIEF CONSTABLE'S OFFICE,
EDINBURGH, 21st November 1894.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you that Mr. Porter, Chief Constable of Berwickshire and Roxburghshire, and myself have met to-day for the purpose of considering this question, and now beg respectfully to forward you our views for the information of your honourable committee.

Tramps.—During the six years the census has been taken the number and variety of tramps has remained stationary. It has been repeatedly tried to identify individuals, families, and groups, but all such attempts have proved futile.

Only a few prominent facts can be laid hold of,—a given number of males, females, and children, with a tendency to group themselves into towns in winter and the country in summer,—so many English, Scotch, and Irish. Beyond that we cannot pass, except to say that the children are wholly illiterate.

What we think should be insisted upon is, lay hold of the children, and every case in which it can be shown to a magistrate that their education has been neglected, or in which it is shown that the parents are unable to provide for their education, commit them to a state-endowed industrial school for such time as may best insure education and industrial habits. Of course they would have to be distributed according to nationality. In Table 21 of H.M. Inspector of Constabulary's Report for the year ending 15th March 1894, the number of vagrant children shown as under fourteen years of age is 1402 (summer census), and 1062 (winter census).

We are not in favour of shelter houses, which only tend to draw a larger proportion of tramps to the district where they are.

Re the Relief of Sick Tramps.—With the Local Government Act in operation, County Councils have a certain amount of interest in parochial business, and the Local Government Amendment Act, recently passed into law, has increased that interest. That being so, would it not be an advantage to have an Inspector of Poor for each county or group of counties, who would control the inspectors for the different parishes, and thus establish a uniform system of dealing with the migratory and wandering poor?

Re Habitual Offenders.—We mean the vagrant and tramp variety, the men and women whose chief object in life is to live off the public by begging, cheating, and purloining, and whose secondary object is to get drink and create a disturbance in every village which they visit.

The way in which this class of offenders is disposed of has no deterrent effect. They generally plead guilty, and in nine cases out of ten their sentence does not exceed seven days, which are spent in recruiting their health. In dealing with this class, in every case where the police can show that the person charged has been previously convicted, there should be a 'remand' for eight days, to give time to produce lists of previous convictions, and, according to the number and variety, so should the sentence be.

Under the Prevention of Crimes Act, a magistrate may sentence a man to three months' imprisonment. Why not give a similar sentence to an habitual offender?

There is a difficulty in disposing of dependents (women and children). At present they are thrown on the parochial boards. Why not send them to a state-endowed industrial school?

With regard to such schools we think they should be established, maintained, and governed by the Prison Commissioners. The number of prisoners, were this system vigorously enforced, would be greatly reduced.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

A. BORTHWICK, Lieut.-Col.,
Chief Constable.

Sir Charles Cameron, Bart., M.P.,
Chairman of Habitual Offenders, &c., Committee.

APPENDIX XXXIX.

HANDED IN BY CAPTAIN M'HARDY, R.N.,
CHIEF CONSTABLE OF AYRSHIRE.

TO THE POLICE COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY OF AYR.

CHIEF CONSTABLE'S OFFICE,
AYR, 6th Nov. 1879.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—In compliance with instructions of your Committee, I have the honour to submit the following report relating to vagrancy, and the question of conferring similar powers for the suppression of vagrancy on constables in rural districts as they possess in burghs under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862.

Until the passing of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, which extended to Scotland the Rogue and Vagabond Clause of the English Vagrancy Act, the need of legislation, which would confer upon the constabulary in counties powers enabling them to act effectively for the protection of the public from the evil practices of vagrants, was much felt, and was forcibly and frequently brought under notice by the late chief constable of this county. His views thereon, which your Committee know were based upon most careful consideration and ample experience, will be found fully stated in documents dated 28th January and 17th February 1870, appended to the report of the House of Commons Committee 1870, on Poor Law, Scotland (pages 345 and 349).

The Rogue and Vagabond Clause above referred to as thus extended to Scotland, in conjunction with the following statutes,—The Trespass (Scotland) Act 1865, The Industrial Schools' Act 1866, The Pedlars Act 1871, and the Betting Act 1874, has conferred upon the constabulary powers which, if generally, uniformly and stringently enforced, I am satisfied must prove very effective in suppressing the worst features of vagrancy. I am strengthened in this opinion by reference to reports of the late chief constable on the subject (extracts appended), from which it will be observed that he attributed the great decrease which occurred each year from 1871 to 1875 in the number of tramps and beggars found within the county of the constabulary, though in some measure to increased prosperity in trade, in great part to the operation of the aforementioned statutes.

In the absence of a uniform system regulating the returns upon which the statistics of vagrancy are compiled, these returns, though useful as denoting the annual changes in any one district, can be but of small value for purposes of comparison of one police district with another; but, taken collectively, the totals will probably afford a fair index of the annual variations throughout Scotland. The statistics appended to the annual reports of Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary (Scotland) show some increase in the number of vagrants challenged by the police in each year since 1874, and this increase has been considerable in the last two years. Vide the following table:—

YEAR.	TOTAL NO. OF VAGRANTS CHALLENGED THROUGHOUT SCOTLAND.	INCREASE ON PREVIOUS YEAR.
1874	40,817	139
1875	42,223	1406
1876	43,893	1670
1877	47,590	3697
1878	54,236	6716

I would submit to your Committee my opinion that the increase here shown is not evidence that the repressive powers, which the law at present bestows, are ineffective, but may very reasonably be attributed to the stagnation of trade, and the consequent extraordinary distress which has prevailed during the past two years; and, under the circumstances, it is remarkable the comparatively small inconvenience to residents in rural districts, and the few occasions for complaint, with which the increase has been attended.

On reference to those reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary for England, in which statistics on the subject are given, it will be observed that the increase in the number of vagrants has of late years been quite as marked, if not more so, in England, notwithstanding the very stringent Vagrancy Act in operation.

Reports for S.
Police District
for year 1877,

p. 224.

Reports of H. of
C. Committee on Police, 1883—

Report, p. 189.

Under these circumstances I do not consider need has been shown for an extension to counties of the full powers provided in burgha. I am of opinion that an attempt to suppress vagrancy by committals to jail would prove an expensive failure—it was tried some years ago in the county of Essex, and, during a period of three years, about 1000 were committed to prison, but it only led to considerable expense without producing any favourable result—further, I deem it a matter of serious consideration whether making simple begging and simple vagrancy punishable with imprisonment might not bear harshly on the honest but destitute way-farer, and I fear its tendency to drive many destitute people to desperation, resulting in robbery and housebreaking—crimes from which the rural districts of Scotland are comparatively free.

This report has been mainly directed to consideration of the possibility of legislating successfully for the further numerical reduction of vagrancy; but before concluding I would mention the following points which are closely allied to the subject, and in regard to which, from want of legal powers for dealing with the cases, the constabulary in counties at present labour under some disadvantage. Although the circumstances are not such as call for separate legislation, I consider, if at any time legislating on a kindred subject, that it is desirable the opportunity should be taken to provide enactments applicable to these cases:—

1. Cases of begging attended with abusive or insulting words or behaviour not necessarily amounting in a legal sense to intimidation.
2. Common prostitutes loitering and importuning passengers for the purpose of prostitution.
3. Dealers in old clothes visiting from door to door.
4. Rag and bone gatherers, &c.

Of the above cases,

1. Is not specially provided for in the General Police Act or any other Statute, but of course can be dealt with where simple begging is an offence.
2. Is an offence under the General Police Act, and it would be an advantage it should be constituted an offence wheresoever committed.
3. It is desirable these persons should be placed under regulations similar to those in force for pedlars.
4. These persons should be also supervised by the Police and required to be certificated.

I have the honour to be, my Lords and Gentlemen, your obedient Servant,

HARDY M'HARDY,
Commander R.N.,
and Chief Constable of Ayrshire.

B.—EXTRACTS RELATING TO VAGRANCY FROM REPORTS SUBSEQUENT TO 1870 OF THE LATE CHIEF CONSTABLE (CAPTAIN YOUNG), TO THE POLICE COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY OF AYR, AND OTHERS.

From Report to the Justices of the Peace for the County in Quarter Session, dated 20th November 1871.

Recent legislation—including the Acts relating to Trespass, Gamblers, Pedlars, and especially the Statute of this year (The Prevention of Crimes Act)—has given the Police power to act effectively for the protection of the public from most of the evil practices of the vagrant class which were not heretofore criminal.

From Annual Return of Crime, dated 13th January 1872.

There has been a substantial decrease in the amount of vagrancy in the County, especially since the constabulary were empowered to act effectively against rogues and vagabonds.

From Annual Return of Crime, dated 11th January 1873.

The number of tramps and beggars found within the County by the Constabulary during last year was 10,402. This shows the great decrease of 3063 since the previous year. It is attributable, in great part, to the strict enforcement of the powers given to constables by the Rogue and Vagabond Clause of the Prevention of Crimes Act, in connection with the Trespass Act and Pedlars Act. Under these and other Statutes, the police are now enabled to suppress some of the worst practices of vagrants; and their efforts in this County have been readily supported by the magistrates with a very beneficial effect, both as regards vagrancy and various descriptions of crime.

From Report to the Police Committee, dated 17th April 1873.

I am glad to bring under the notice of the Committee the remarkable decrease of vagrancy during the last two years. The number of vagrants entered in the Police Returns for 1870 was 17,421; in 1871 the number was 13,465; and last year, 10,402, being a decrease of 7019 within two years. The prosperous state of trade has had some influence in this change; but the proportion of vagrants really belonging to the working classes is at all times small, and the foregoing comparison chiefly shows the effect of recent statutes under which some of the worst practices of vagabonds can be effectually checked by the police, and the offenders punished.

From Annual Return of Crime, dated 10th January 1874.

The number of tramps and beggars found within the County by the constabulary during last year was 7874. This is a decrease of 2528 within last year, and of 5591 in comparison with the year 1871. This extraordinary decrease occurred chiefly in the number of women and children; and it thus indicates, in particular, the gradual suppression of habitual vagrancy. The police, though still without a general Vagrancy Act, can now enforce several statutes for the punishment of impostors and habitual vagabonds; and the above figures show, to some extent, the result of that action in this County; but the general prosperity of trade has also lessened vagrancy.

C.—AYRSHIRE CONSTABULARY.

TRESPASS, VAGRANCY, ROGUES, AND VAGABONDS.

With a view to making more widely known certain acts of Parliament dealing with cases of Trespass and Vagrancy, and enlisting the sympathy and aid of the community generally in enforcing these, several posting bills have been prepared, and are now issued to each Constabulary Station in the County. These posters are for general and thorough circulation throughout the District, they are to be distributed by the local Constables, and are to be posted up in the most suitable places which will ensure their being seen, and will admit of their being easily read and not too readily effaced. It is particularly desirable that these bills should be posted up in Common Lodging-Houses, Pawn Offices, Coal Pit Offices, Iron Work Offices, Brick Works, Oil and Chemical Works, Blacksmiths' Shops, and all Vagrant Resting-places, Crossings of Main Roads, Railway Stations, and Telegraph Offices.

Strict attention must be given by the Constables to keeping a Record of all Vagrants who pass through each Constabulary area, and the utmost care must be taken in noting the descriptive details required in the weekly Vagrant Returns, especially recording any particulars that may subsequently assist in tracing and identifying them. Inquiries addressed to such people must be made civilly, and in such a manner as to give no cause for any feeling of annoyance; and it cannot be too clearly and generally understood by those interrogated that the supervision thus exercised may prove very useful to themselves, as it tends to guard the well-conducted and law-abiding of this class from unfounded and unjust charges or suspicion.

The Constabulary should endeavour to obtain the fullest information regarding those who have the appearance of habitual Vagrants or Tramps; and whilst they are to carefully guard against undue interference with or any oppression of these people, the Constables should make them clearly understand that their movements are under Police Supervision; and the Constabulary must deal very stringently with any oppressive behaviour or misconduct on the part of such people.

The Constables in Rural Districts have a great responsibility resting upon them in regard to the efficient protection of defenceless women and aged people in isolated places; and whilst dealing with all poor and destitute persons in a humane and proper spirit, the Constabulary will act wisely in certain marked cases of masterful and sturdy Begging on the part of men, or groups of men (such as are likely to cause terror or alarm to the timid), if they very stringently exercise any powers of summary apprehension without warrant which they may possess for dealing with any offence committed by men of this class.

Men who, although destitute and on tramp, are apparently (or are likely to be) bona fide working men seeking employment, must be treated with every consideration and kindness by the Constables, and they should furnish to such persons all the useful information which their knowledge of the locality and of the industries requiring labour may enable them to afford.

In the evening, and during the night, the Constables, when on patrol duty, should give special attention to those places which are likely to be frequented by out-lying tramps and homeless poor, and they must discreetly and conscientiously apply the law against offenders who sleep or camp out without permission: acting in every such case as the particular circumstances may seem to render expedient and proper.

In order to give confidence to the occupiers and proprietors in rural districts and to deter lawless tramps, it is ordered that very special and persevering efforts must be used to apprehend any vagrants or tramps who may be guilty of malicious mischief, intimidating or threatening behaviour, indecency, or other serious offence. The particulars and a full description pointing to the identity of such offenders (if still at large), should in each case be intimated by Telegraph, or by other speedy means of communication, to the Divisional Superintendent, and on receipt of such information at the Divisional Office, arrangements are to be immediately carried out to arrest the offender; and the necessary instructions must be instantly issued to the more likely Stations, to be on the look-out for the accused.

The action of the Constabulary, if it is to prove effective and beneficial in any matter, must be uniform and constant, and all spasmodic activity and excessive zeal is simply mischievous; but this is more especially true in the case of such a wide-spread and deep-rooted social evil as Vagrancy.

A conscientious and persevering and discreet Constable may work incalculable good to a wide locality; a thoughtless, careless, lazy, or over-zealous Constable may both harass and oppress the poor, whilst failing to benefit a single individual or place in his District.

HARDY M'HARDY,
CAPTAIN R.N.
Chief Constable of Ayrshire.

CHIEF CONSTABLE'S OFFICE,
AYR, 25th July 1886.

APPENDIX XL.

VAGRANCY AND BEGGING.

21st December 1894.

SIR,—Since giving my evidence before your Committee yesterday afternoon, with reference to the above, I have carefully looked over the Clauses of the Prevention of Crimes Act (for England), 1871, applicable to Scotland, with reference to Rogues and Vagabonds, and now beg to inform you that clauses of this Act have been put in force in this county, and that four persons were dealt with, under this Act, during the present year.

The 15th Section of the Act referred to clearly means to deal with reputed thieves, or suspected persons, frequenting places for the purpose of committing thefts, but no section of this Act can be made to apply to the ordinary vagrant or beggar (who has not been previously convicted of theft) who may be found regularly begging in the country districts, or in populous places where the Police Act is not adopted, nor does it apply to parents who systematically send their children out to beg. This is the special reason I had in view, while recommending that Clause 408 of the Police Act should be made applicable to counties, which I believe would have a beneficial effect.—I am, Sir, Your Obedient Servant,

CHARLES M'HARDY,
Chief Constable of Dumbartonshire.

Sir Charles Cameron, Bart., M.P.

APPENDIX XLA.

CULTOQUEHY, CRIEFF, N.B.
3rd September, 1894.

Departmental Committee (Vagrants).

DEAR SIR,

I was requested, by parties in this County, interested in the subject referred to in the printed paper accompanying, to convene a meeting in Perth for the purpose of considering what information it is desirable to lay before the Committee, which, we are informed, is to visit Perth early in October.

The printed paper was drawn up and sent me by Mr. Mitchell, Vice-President of the Glasgow School Board, and in consequence, two meetings have taken place in Perth in regard to it.

Before proceeding further, I am requested to communicate with you, in order to ascertain the nature and extent of the information required, if the queries drawn up are on the lines of the scope of the committee, and with whom I may correspond for further information regarding the Commission, and the time of its visit to Perth.

I send you a local paper with paragraph on the subject.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

J. MAXTONE GRAHAM.

To the Right Hon.
Sir GEORGE O. TREVELYAN, Bart., M.P.,
Scottish Office, Whitehall.

P. S.—I have not had the pleasure of meeting you for some time, not having been in London for some years back. When you have to be in the Scottish Office in Edinburgh, at any future time, I shall be glad if you will let me know, when I may have it in my power to renew an acquaintance.

J. M. G.

APPENDIX XLB.

EXTRACT from the Minutes of the Parochial Board of the Barony Parish of Glasgow of date 28th August 1894, forwarded to Sir CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P., Balclutha, Greenock.

Habitual Offenders.

On the motion of Mr. Brand it was unanimously agreed to record the Board's gratification at the appointment by the Secretary for Scotland of a Departmental Commission to inquire into the alleged increase of Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, and Inebriates in Scotland, and the Board's desire that the inquiry may be of such a character that legislation may follow the Report of the Commission, and prove the means of checking the evils resulting from the present methods of dealing with the classes named.

APPENDIX XLI.

11 GROSVENOR TERRACE,
HILLHEAD, GLASGOW,
January 30, 1895.

Dr. Sutherland,

DEAR SIR,—With reference to the visit of your Committee to our Hill Street Shelter for Women on 17th November, I think, that in an institution like ours, which is not worked for private gains, and when the sole object is solicitude for the reformation of the women, and their restoration to suitable places in society, the number of hours worked should not be assimilated to those of women under the Factory Act, for this reason, that the amount of work done in the ten hours is considerably less than that done in eight hours in a public laundry or sewing-room.

We find it better for the women to occupy part of their evenings than have them idle; and as I told the Committee in evidence, 'we try to make our Shelters, as much as possible, Homelike, and in consequence the women are very happy and contented.'

I stated to Sir Charles Cameron, in the last question he put to me, that I thought our Shelters had a claim to the Government Subvention given to Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, as we are doing the same work—rescuing women who have been in the police offices and in prison, and those who are fairly on their way to one or both. We would gladly welcome the visits of any 'Visitor or Inspector of Retreats,' who would enquire into the condition of the inmates.—I remain, very sincerely yours,

JANE FERGUSON,
Hon. President of the Houses of Shelter.

APPENDIX XLII.

RESOLUTION adopted at Meeting of the FIFTEEN
LADY VISITORS OF GLASGOW PRISON.

November 14th, 1894.

Resolved,—That from our observation as Prison Visitors, we entertain a strong conviction of the entire uselessness of repeated short sentences either to deter or reform offenders. For the large class of women who are repeatedly sent to prison for terms of from 24 hours to 14 days for drunkenness, we consider that lengthening periods of detention, with a view to reformation, would be greatly preferable.

On behalf of the Prison Visiting Committee,

MARY WHITE, Convener.

APPENDIX XLIII.

MEMORANDUM by Mr F. P. WALTON, Secretary to the Lord Advocate, as to the Responsibility of Publicans, &c.

Section 13 of 35 and 36 Vict. c. 94 (English Act) states :—
'That if any licensed person permits drunkenness or any violent, quarrelsome, or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or sells any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding for the first offence ten pounds, and not exceeding for the second or any subsequent offence twenty pounds.'

Section 7 of 25 and 26 Vict. c. 35 (Scotland) states :—' That he (the licence holder) shall not knowingly permit any breach of the peace, or riotous or disorderly conduct,

'within his premises, or supply liquors to persons in a state of intoxication.'

The penalty for so doing for the 1st offence is £5.

" 2nd " £10.

9 Geo. iv. c. 58, sec. 21.

The difference between the English and Scottish Acts lies in the amounts of the penalties imposed for each offence ; and, in Scotland, the licence holder shall not knowingly permit, &c., whereas in England the word knowingly does not appear.

Under Secretary for Scotland.

The opinion of English counsel seems to cover the questions raised in Mr. Dunbar's letter as to the English law on the matter.

I think the law of Scotland is the same.

In the recent case of Linton v. Stirling, 1893, 20 R. J. C. 71 (Court of Sessions' Cases, 4th series), it was said by the Lord Justice-Clerk that the publican's certificate, which is given as a schedule to the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), 'forbids the sale of liquor to a person in a state of intoxication. It is sufficient to prove that liquor was sold to a person in that state ; it is unnecessary to prove that the publican knew he was intoxicated, if it can be proved he was so.'

By Sect. 14 of the Act of 1862, the police may report the names of 'all persons licensed to sell excisable liquors by retail from whose premises persons in a state of intoxication have been frequently seen to issue,' and these reports are to be brought under the notice of the Justices of Peace or Magistrates when the application is made for a renewal of the certificate.

If there be any other point as to which I can give any assistance, I shall be delighted to do so.

F. P. WALTON.

APPENDIX XLIV.

MEMORANDUM AND RETURNS by Mr. WILLIAM GEDDES, Governor of Dundee Prison.

H.M. PRISON,
DUNDEE, 7th January 1894.

DEAR DR. SUTHERLAND,—I enclose a list of the names of persons written out by the prisoner, James Handy (interviewed by Sir Charles Cameron on his recent visit to this prison), and known to him as being reformatory school-boys, along with a detailed list of convictions, &c., against them.

I also enclose for Sir Charles' information separate returns of offenders committed to prison during the past year who had previously been under detention in reformatory and industrial schools.

I stated in giving evidence before your Committee that a larger proportion of fines, &c., was paid on Saturdays than on any other day of the week, due, of course, to the Saturday pays ; and I enclose a statement showing the percentage of such fines paid on Saturday, and necessarily the following Monday, as against the other four days of the week.—I am, yours faithfully,

WILLIAM GEDDES, Governor.

Dr. J. F. Sutherland.

Alexeander M'Cabe, Aruthur Donnelly, Mairtian M'Dennel, Patrick Carr, Thomas Clark, Charles Collins, Frances Kelly, Banerd Kelly, Patrick Gollacher, John Ramsay, Andrew Fitzpatrick, James Lee, John Henderson, Mairtan Preston, Patrick Helley. I do not ne any more at present only by neek names.

APPENDIX XLV.

MEMORANDUM of Mr. WM. NAPIER, Governor of Greenock Prison.To SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P.
BALCLUTHA, GREENOCK.H.M. PRISON GREENOCK.
4th Jan. 1894.

I have delayed sending the information you desired from prisoner, Patrick Docherty, till my annual return was completed, in order to show how many Old Reformatory and Industrial School boys and girls were in Greenock Prison during 1894. I attach copy of Reformatory Return. Col. Inglis, Inspector of Reformatories, London, will be able to furnish copies of Returns from all the prisons in Scotland. Your obediently,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

Prisoner, Patrick Docherty, says that the first theft he was charged with, and connected for after leaving the Reformatory was for stealing a few sweeties, which another old reformatory boy stole and handed to him. He got 15 days' for that, and when liberated he was apprehended on leaving the prison and charged with stealing a pair of boots, which he got from another thief to pawn; he admits he knew they were stolen before he pawned them.

He was afterwards charged with theft of an oilskin coat which he found, he says, in a w.c. on the street, and kept it. He was acquitted of this charge.

At another time he was charged with stealing a pipe he got from a man to get a smoke from, and was convicted.

Again he was charged with stealing 35s. which another old reformatory boy stole and gave him share of it; the boy (M'Intyre) referred to peached on him and was taken as a witness he got 6 months for that job.

In regard to old reformatory boys he says he knows a good many going about Greenock, who either cannot get work, or will not work, because they have no trade learned. Slipper-making, he says, is a sham trade, and so is match-box making, which is taught in some reformatories, as work cannot be got at either on liberation.

The names of Old Reformatory boys he knows, and whom he has seen in Greenock Prison after liberation from the Reformatory, are as follows:—

James Harkin's, from Aberdeen Reformatory.
George M'Neil, " James Docherty, "
Patrick Hickie got two sentences in Dalbeth Reformatory.
James Brady, " Dalbeth "
John Cairns, " " "
Michael Loy, " " "
James M'Intyre, " Paisley Reformatory.
Robert Jamieson, " " "
Colin M'Arthur, " " " Robert M'Geachan, " Kilmarnock Industrial School.
I attach copy of the number recognised by prison officers as being in prison during the year 1894, viz.:—
Patrick Docherty, Aberdeen Reformatory.
Patrick Hickie, Dalbeth Reformatory.
Michael Loy, "
John Cairns alias John Steel, Dalbeth Reformatory.
James Hunter, Dalbeth Reformatory.
John Black, Kibble Reformatory, Paisley.
George Steel, "
Janet Foster, Dalry Reformatory, Edinburgh.

In Industrial Schools.

Robert Morran, St Mary's, Glasgow.
John M'Quiggan, "
John Woodside, Captain Street, Greenock.
Arch. M'Farlane, " "
Peter Sweeney, " "
Robert Jamieson, " "
Colin M'Laughlan, " "
Andrew M'Culloch, " "
Robert M'Geachan, Kilmarnock. " Bridget Gallocher, St Mary's, Glasgow.
Rose Ann Gallocher, " " Helen Paterson, "
Mary Ann Gallocher, Captain St. Greenock.
Margaret Gallocher, Rothesay.

A few of the above have been in prison several times during 1894.

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

Patrick Docherty, born in March 1872. On 21st January 1884 he was sentenced to 10 days' imprisonment and 4 years in a reformatory. On 13th, February 1888 he was liberated from Oldmill Reformatory, Aberdeen. His convictions since that time have been 28, 25 before the Police Magistrates, and 3 before the Sheriff, the longest sentence being one of 9 months.

* Dependents are not included in the columns showing age and nationality.

It is a striking fact that fully three-fifths of those admitted to the Shelter-Houses did not exceed 40 years of age, and that more than one-half of them were English.

JEDBURGH, 29th November 1894.

APPENDIX XLVII.

REGULATIONS under which the Punishment of Whipping to be Inflicted on Juvenile Male Offenders under the Acts 23 & 24 Vic. cap. 105, sec. 74, and 25 & 26 Vic. cap. 18.

1. The punishment to be inflicted with a birch rod in all cases where the age of the offender shall not exceed 14 years. The stripes to be applied to the breech, and not to exceed 12. The punishment of offenders above the age of 14 shall be inflicted with leather taws or a birch rod. The stripes to be applied to the breech, and in no case to exceed 36. Such birch rods and leather taws shall be approved of by the sheriff or sheriff-substitute of each sheriffdom. The punishment to be sufficiently severe to cause a repetition of it to be dreaded.

2. The person who inflicts punishment shall be named by the sheriff, and where the person so named is a police constable he shall be bound to act.

3. The punishment shall be inflicted in such police office or cell, or other suitable place, if possible within or adjoining the court house, as shall be fixed by the sheriff; and the sheriff shall see that such proper place is provided in each town within his jurisdiction where sheriff, justice of the peace, or burgh criminal courts are in use to be held. The punishment shall take place in presence of the chief constable or of an officer of police of rank not below a sergeant, and, when so directed by the court or magistrate pronouncing the sentence, of the police surgeon or other duly qualified Medical Practitioner.

4. The surgeon or medical practitioner, where his presence as aforesaid has been directed, shall examine the offender before the punishment is inflicted, and where he shall consider that the prescribed number of stripes, or any part thereof, cannot be inflicted consistently with the health of the offender, he shall certify the same in writing, and fix the number of stripes, which shall thereupon be limited in terms of such certificate; but where the said certificate shall bear that one-half of the prescribed punishment cannot be safely inflicted, the offender shall be deemed to be unfit for this mode of punishment, and no part of the same shall be inflicted.

5. The surgeon or medical practitioner, where his presence as aforesaid has been directed, shall always have it in his power to stop the infliction of the punishment in its course, even though one-half has not been suffered, if a continuation would, in his opinion, prove hurtful to the health of the offender, and he shall certify his having done so accordingly.

6. Where whipping is to be substituted for imprisonment, or for imprisonment and hard labour, the same shall be inflicted immediately after sentence, or as soon thereafter as conveniently may be; not later than the day of sentence.

7. Where whipping is ordered in addition to imprisonment, or imprisonment and hard labour, the punishment shall take place as soon after sentence as possible, and before the offender is transmitted to prison.

8. A register of all offenders sentenced to be whipped shall be kept by the chief constable or other officer in charge of the premises where such sentence is carried out, and registers for this purpose will be supplied by the Prison Commissioners for Scotland, 130 George Street, Edinburgh, to whom returns of such sentences shall be made from time to time as may be demanded by them.

Note.—In all cases where whipping is substituted for imprisonment or imprisonment and hard labour, it will be proper that a warrant be inserted in the interlocutors to transmit the offender to the place approved by the sheriff, in order to undergo his sentence, and to detain him until such sentence is carried into effect; and in order to provide for the contingency of the offender being deemed by the surgeon or other medical practitioner to be unfit for this mode of punishment, the sentence should also contain an alternative, depending on that contingency, of such other punishment as would have been awarded before the passing of the said Act 25 & 26 Vic. cap. 18, or should direct the discharge of the offender.

J. B. BALFOUR.

I hereby signify my approval of the above Regulations.
HUGH C. K. CHILDERS.

WHITEHALL, 11th June 1886.

Proportion of Prisoners without Scottish Settlements.

PRISON COMMISSION FOR SCOTLAND,
EDINBURGH, 25th April 1895.

SIR,—With reference to the Table of Nationalities given of late years in the Scottish Prison Reports, I estimate that about 20 per cent. of the prisoners returned as English, Irish, and Foreigners, are without a legal settlement in Scotland.

I am,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,
WM. DONALDSON,
Secretary.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P.,

APPENDIX LXI.

THE ELMIRA REFORMATORY,
NEW YORK STATE.CHARGES AGAINST THE MANAGERS AND SUPERINTENDENT.The Decision of the Governor of New York State.

Governor Flower made public the reports of Dr. Austin Flint and Assemblyman Israel T. Deyo, the majority of the Commission, on the 10th December 1894, and with them his own decision dismissing the charges against the Board of Managers, on the ground that cruelty had not been practised at the institution, and that they were groundless. He also made public the minority report, signed by Ex-Judge William L. Learned. This report, while it sustains some of the charges, gives no excuse for the gross and libellous assaults on Superintendent Brockway.

In his decision, which is in part as follows, the Governor says:—

'The Governor has no power to remove or to appoint a superintendent of the Reformatory. That power is lodged with the Board of Managers. I have power to remove the managers, after giving them an opportunity to be heard upon written charges. This is the proceeding now before me. It naturally involves primarily the charges against Superintendent Brockway. If he is guilty of inflicting the inhuman, degrading, and cruel punishments attributed to him, the managers are certainly negligent in permitting such practices to continue.

'Within eight days after the service of the charges upon them the managers entered a general denial, and thereupon a committee was appointed to take testimony, and to report to me the material facts found. That Commission consisted of the Hon. William L. Learned of Albany, formerly Justice of the Supreme Court; Dr. Austin Flint of New York City, one of the foremost physiologists of the world; and the Hon. Israel T. Deyo of Binghamton, a lawyer of ability, who has served a long time in the State Legislature, and is familiar with our State reformatory and prison system.

'It is a source of much gratification that the testimony shows, according to both reports of findings, that there was no truth in the harrowing statements published in newspapers of injuries alleged to have been inflicted by the General Superintendent or his subordinates upon inmates of the Reformatory. Upon this point all three Commissioners find substantially the same facts, and exonerate the managers and the superintendent.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT LAWFUL.

'Before proceeding further in this direction, it becomes necessary to consider whether corporal punishment in the Reformatory is not prohibited by statute. The question is not strictly pertinent to this inquiry, for it was not claimed in the charges against the managers that corporal punishment is unlawful, or that they were violating the law in permitting the superintendent to inflict corporal punishment. But the claim was made by counsel on the submission of the case to the Commissioners. At most, the unlawfulness of corporal punishment in the Reformatory is a disputed point, with the weight of authority in favour of the managers.

THE CASE OF MOSES AARON.

'There is one other conspicuous case of flogging which deserves consideration. It is that of Moses Aaron, who was flogged several times, and punished in "seclusion" and "rest-cure" cells, although it appeared afterward that he was insane, and that during a part of the period of his punishment he was under the observance of the Reformatory physician as to his sanity. This is the only case of the kind recorded by the majority of the Commission, as established by the evidence. It was established that the Board of Managers had no knowledge of the unfortunate circumstances connected with the case; indeed, that no one seemed aware of the facts until the full details were brought out by this investigation.

'Corporal punishment necessarily implies physical pain, and all pain is not cruelty. All the Commissioners agree that the evidence exonerates Mr. Brockway from any cruelties which inflicted serious or permanent injuries upon convicts. Whether he was "cruel" in spanking too many times, or too severely within that limitation of not producing injury, is partially a matter of fact and partially a matter of sensitiveness, depending upon the point of view. I do not think that an assertion of cruelty is justified by the facts. Of course the superintendent may have been unnecessarily harsh in some instances; I believe he was, but in the main he seems to have exercised his authority to inflict corporal punishment with great moderation and care, and his occasional lapses have not justified a sweeping or general condemnation of his methods and practices. But whether corporal punishment is advisable or not, the law as it affects all penal institutions ought to be clear, and if public sentiment is opposed to corporal punishment, the Legislature should voice that sentiment in unmistakable language. Commissioners Flint and Deyo, however, find that corporal punishment, under proper restrictions and regulations, is preferable to other methods of punishment, which must necessarily take its place: if corporal punishment shall be abolished.

'The findings relative to other methods of punishment, including the so-called "seclusion" and "rest cure" cells, do not show confinement, except for conduct in wilful violation of the just requirements of the institution. Discipline must be observed, and convicts cannot be humoured.

THE PAROLE SYSTEM.

'There is no evidence that the power to grant paroles has been abused. On the other hand, it is shown that the rules and regulations adopted by the managers, relating to the release of prisoners on parole, are reasonable and proper.

TRANSFERS TO STATE PRISON.

'The matter of transfers of incorrigible prisoners from the Reformatory to the State prisons was referred to at length in my annual message to the Legislature last January, and later in a special message. It is a matter for legislation, and reflects no blame upon the managers, although, in order to reduce the number of convicts in the Reformatory, they may at times have alternated somewhat the degree of incorrigibility requisite for a transfer. I pointed out in my communication to the Legislature, as Judge Learned again points out in his findings in this investigation, that the transfer of prisoners to State prison practically consigns them to prison for the longest term prescribed by the Penal Code for their offences, and I added:—"In my judgment this system should be altogether abolished, or else so far modified as effectually to prohibit abuse. The managers ought not to be clothed with the arbitrary power of committing to prison for long terms persons sent by the courts to the Reformatory for purposes of reformation. Transfers should be made only for good cause, and upon application to the court in which the person sought to be transferred was convicted, so that the punishment may be properly adjusted, or else other legal proceedings should be required as may be necessary to prevent injustice. I respectfully recommend such legislation as will correct the evils now existing."

'No change in the law was made, however, and the evil still exists. Six hundred and eight transfers have been made under the statute, and, in the opinion of the Commissioners, the power has in no case been abused by the managers.'

THE CHARGES NOT JUSTIFIED.

'I have given painstaking study to the consideration of the charges against the managers, and my conclusion is that the evidence does not justify their removal from office. While in some respects the managers deserve criticism, as do their subordinates, they are not guilty of permitting gross abuses in the infliction of punishment, or in the management of the institution. The managers are honourable men, devoted to the interests of the institution, and jealous of its fair name. They receive no compensation for their services, and consequently cannot be expected to give all their time to its interests. A large part of the details of the management must necessarily be entrusted to their superintendent and other subordinates. The managers are of course responsible if abuses exist, but in spite of the vehemence of the attacks upon the institution it has not been successfully shown that grave abuses do exist, or have existed under the present management.'

'The charges are, in the main, not proven, and are therefore dismissed. ROSWELL P. FLOWER.'

THE ELMIRA REFORMATORY.

MAJORITY REPORT.

DR. AUSTIN FLINT AND ASSEMBLYMAN ISRAEL DEYO
FIND MUCH TO PRAISE, LITTLE TO CONDEMN.

The majority report, signed by Dr. Austin Flint and Assemblyman Israel T. Deyo, begins by relating the appointment and organisation of the Committee, and regrets that Judge Learned dissents. It says:—

'We diverged so widely, however, in our views upon many of the material points involved, that we are unable to unite in a report, without either admitting certain findings which all of us deemed essential, or yielding honest convictions, a proposition which none of us could entertain.'

After setting forth the power of the Governor to remove the managers, though not the General Superintendent, the nature and scope of the inquiry is discussed, and it is stated:—

'A thorough personal examination has been made of the Reformatory from time to time during the progress of the investigation. Every courtesy and facility was afforded to us to inspect the actual workings of the institution, in its various branches, and to converse privately with the inmates, of which we freely availed ourselves.'

'The complainants, without restriction to any specific issues, were permitted, without objection, to introduce evidence to support, upon any theory of the case, the general charges preferred against the managers, of "misconduct, incompetency, and neglect of duty." All the books and records of the institution called for were placed before us, and the complainants had ample opportunity to examine the same.'

'In many instances, however,' the report continues, 'we deemed it advisable to go outside the line of prosecution and defence marked out by the attorneys for the respective parties, and called witnesses on our own account relative to any matter which would throw light on the management of the Reformatory.'

'This course was taken because we deemed it our duty to lay before the Governor the fullest information obtainable within the limits of our Commission, regarding the practical workings of the Reformatory, and the alleged abuses connected with its management. We believe our report covers every material fact upon which a finding was requested, whether embraced by the charges specifically preferred against the managers or not.'

HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT.

'The history and development of the Reformatory is taken up next, and under that head the Act creating the Reformatory is cited, and the appointment of the Board of Managers and Mr. Brockway, General Superintendent, and the early history of the institution is gone into. The report says:—"The statute, in very broad and general terms established, or indicated rather, the outlines of a reformatory system. The development of that system, putting it into practical operation, and the working out of a multitude of details, were left almost wholly to the Board of Managers."

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE REFORMATORY.

'In view of the excellent results that have been accomplished at the Elmira Reformatory in the reformation of criminals, and of the recognised prominence of the institution as an example of a practical application of the highest scientific theories to the treatment of the criminal, we should fall far short of our duty, and do inexcusable injury to the cause of prison reform, did we omit to clearly distinguish between the defects or errors in the internal management of the institution and the institution itself.'

'From our personal examination, as well as from the evidence brought before us on this investigation, we have been deeply impressed with the magnitude and general excellence of the work that is being accomplished at the Reformatory. Certain defects or errors in the internal management were brought to light. To those we shall refer later.'

The institution, taken as a whole, is a remarkable exhibition of detailed organisation. It combines within itself a prison, a school of letters, a school of technology, a school of physical training, a series of manufacturing departments, and a military camp, wherein the pupil, the worker, and cadet, is a felon whom society, for its own protection, has been compelled to deprive of his liberty.

'The convicts received here are felons sentenced to the Reformatory for offences among the gravest known to our laws. They come largely from the lowest stratum of society, ungoverned and ungovernable, ignorant, intemperate, contaminated from early youth by bad home surroundings and associations, without trades or legitimate callings. All, however, are not instinctive or natural criminals. Some clearly belong to that class known as accidental or occasional criminals, who, with different training and surroundings, might have been, instead of a hindrance, an aid to the advancement and progress of society. The problem, the solution of which has been attempted at the Elmira Reformatory, is how to take this class of vicious and unfortunate men, and return them to society, honest, law-abiding, self-supporting citizens; how to protect society through the reformation of the criminal.'

'The machinery employed at the Elmira Reformatory, looking toward the solution of this problem, is complex and intricate. The statute does not describe it. Indeed, the statute itself, as it has been modified from time to time, is but the expression in general terms of the ideas which were being worked out at Elmira at the various stages of their growth and development.'

The indeterminate sentence, accompanied by reductions and promotions in grade and release on parole, lies at the foundation of the whole system. Theoretically, at least, the prisoner may, within certain limits, terminate or continue the period of his imprisonment at will.

'Under the rules adopted by the managers to carry into effect this provision of the statute, it is possible for any prisoner, for whatever offence he may have been convicted, and regardless of the maximum length of term for which he might have been imprisoned, to obtain by good conduct his release upon parole in twelve months, and his absolute release in six months longer.'

'The marking and the wage-earning plans are really parts of a single system. Each convict is debited and credited in dollars and cents, according to a certain scale, with gains and losses in school, labour, and deportment. From the time of his admission the convict is put in the position of a wage-earner, being charged for his board, clothing, losses in labour and demeanour, and credited with his earnings. To maintain his standing in grade the convict must maintain a credit balance to his account; and, as a condition to his release on parole, he must have accumulated sufficient money to carry him to his destination and defray his expenses until he receives his first wages. These general provisions are modified by some exceptions, whereby monetary losses may, for special reasons, be remitted or recovered.'

'Under this system convicts may, and in many instances do, earn a considerable balance to their credit before parole, which is paid to them in money.'

THE INMATE MONITOR SYSTEM.

'Under the inmate monitor system it is possible for charges to be preferred against a convict through malice or jealousy, or to be withheld through favour, which might affect his standing, his subsequent treatment, and even the duration of his imprisonment. This would be possible under any system. Reasonable precautions are, however, taken to protect a convict from undeserved reports, and we think the dangers from this source are slight, and the instances in which injustice has been done are exceedingly rare. Each inmate monitor, while on duty, is constantly under the eye of a citizen officer, and his reports are supervised and examined by his superiors. Every charge against a convict in the usual course of administration, which could by any possibility affect his standing in grade, is made in writing, and a copy is handed to the accused, who may deny the charge if not guilty, in which case it is investigated by the General Superintendent or his first officer; or, if there be extenuating circumstances, he may explain, the offence may be excused, and the marks cancelled. If the charge is sustained by the officer making the investigation, the convict may have a trial by court-martial. In any case of real or fancied grievances, opportunity is offered by which any convict may lay his case before the Board of Managers.'

'As the prisoner advances in grade, his wages for labour are increased, he has a better quality of food and clothing, better prison accommodations, and greater privileges and comforts; and in the meanwhile he is gradually approaching the time when he will be entitled to his release on parole. Reduction in grade is accompanied with a corresponding loss of advantages and privileges, followed, perhaps, by other measures which are more punitive and deterrent in their character.

After stating the method of promotion in grade the report continues :—

'While in the Reformatory, convicts get instruction in a well-organised school of letters, embracing primary, elementary, and academic branches of learning. During the year ending Sept. 30, 1893, more than 2000 convicts received instruction in the school of letters. A well-organised trade system of trade schools gives opportunity for technical training. Such instruction was given during the year ending Sept. 30, 1894, in thirty-four different trades, to more than 1800 convicts.

'Military drill is given to every able-bodied convict. The Reformatory population is organised into a regiment of four battalions, each consisting of sixteen companies, with staff and officers. They hold dress parade daily, and regimental drills twice a week. The men are armed with "dummy" guns, weighing five or six pounds, and the drills are held under the supervision of one civilian officer. A well-equipped gymnasium, with suitable appliances, and Turkish baths, furnish the means whereby systematic training is given to men of defective physical condition. A library, lectures, concerts, and religious services, are among the means employed for the recreation and improvement of the inmates. The school of letters, the trade schools, the military department, and the gymnasium are well organised, and in them satisfactory results have been accomplished. In the trade schools especially the men manifest a degree of interest and enthusiasm in their efforts to acquire a trade whereby they may earn an honest living outside of the Reformatory that is both surprising and encouraging.

'The buildings and cells are clean, neat, and well ventilated. Very strict discipline is enforced, and good order prevails. Obedience to constituted authority is first learned in the Reformatory by many convicts.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REFORMATORY.

'The government of the Reformatory is vested by law in a Board of Managers, who have authority to appoint a General Superintendent, and to remove him for cause after opportunity shall be given him to be heard on written charges, and to make all rules and regulations necessary and proper for the employment, discipline, instruction, education, removal, and temporary or conditional release of the convicts. The Board of Managers have general charge and supervision of the Reformatory.

'While the General Superintendent is the agent of the Board of Managers in the immediate charge of the Reformatory, he is, nevertheless, to a large extent independent of them.

'The statutes intrust to him the exclusive authority to appoint and remove at pleasure all officers, guards, and employees of the Reformatory, except foremen, instructors, and the financial agent.

'The Board of Managers has from time to time adopted such rules and regulations as were necessary and proper under the requirements of the statute for the government of the Reformatory, and the guidance and control of the convicts. Some of these rules and regulations have been adopted by formal action of the Board. The Board, however, never has passed a formal resolution adopting any rules or regulations in respect to corporal punishment, or defining the grounds upon which such punishment might be administered. The particular methods of administration were left largely to the judgment and discretion of the General Superintendent. The General Superintendent, however, reported to and consulted with the managers in respect to the use of corporal punishment as a means of discipline and punishment in the Reformatory. They were fully advised with reference to the general nature, character, and extent to which corporal punishment and other disciplinary measures were used in the Reformatory, and they fully acquiesced in and approved of the same.

RECORDS WELL KEPT.

'The records of the Reformatory, excepting those of the medical department, to which we refer elsewhere, have been kept according to a well conceived, convenient plan, carried out with great fullness. The history of each man, from the time he is received into the Reformatory until his discharge, is recorded in detail.

'The records appear to have been kept with great care and accuracy, and have supplied the statistical data contained in this report.

GRANTING OF PAROLE.

'The statute does not specify the conditions upon which a prisoner may be released on parole, nor does it fix the minimum term of imprisonment before parole. These questions are left to the Board of Managers. The Board of Managers sit as a parole court four times a year—in January, April, July, and October. These meetings are usually attended by the full Board. Notice of such meetings is given to the convicts. All convicts who have been four months in the upper first grade are called before the Board, except in special cases. A list of such men is prepared and placed before the Board, with the recommendation of the General Superintendent as to each case. As the name of each man on the list is called, he is brought before the Board, when he is questioned by the managers, and his record is examined. Upon the record of the convict in the institution, his answers to the inquiries, his general appearance and manner, and on the recommendation of the Superintendent, parole is either authorised or refused. When released on parole the convict gets his certificate of parole, containing a printed endorsement of the conditions of parole to be observed, as follows :—

Then follows the paper in full with this finding :—

'We find that the rules and regulations adopted by the managers relating to the release of prisoners on parole are reasonable and proper, and their authority in this respect has been exercised with care and prudence, with due regard to the interest of the prisoner and the welfare of society, and in no case has any convict been unjustly or improperly refused his parole.'

CANCELLATION OF PAROLE AND RE-ARREST.

Under the authority conferred by the statute, agents have been appointed by the managers in different parts of the State, who are charged with the duty of supervising prisoners who have been released on parole, to whom the paroled men are required to report in person once a month, and by whom the reports must be certified. The agent of the New York Prison Association performs those duties in New York city and vicinity. Chiefs of police and district attorneys in other places perform similar duties. Such agents also assist in investigating matters relative to alleged violations of parole.

Whenever a paroled man fails to make his monthly report to the Reformatory, or when information is received that he is violating other conditions of his parole, the case is investigated by the Reformatory Authorities, through their agents, by messenger or by correspondence. If it is ascertained that a paroled man is failing to conform to the conditions of his parole, he is at once re-arrested and brought back to the Reformatory.

Of the entire number of prisoners paroled prior to September 30, 1893, there have been re-arrested and returned to the Reformatory, for violation of parole, 259 men, or 7 per cent. of the entire number paroled, of which 110 were subsequently paroled a second time, and 10 a third time.

The warrant for the re-arrest of paroled men who have violated their parole are signed in blank by the managers and delivered to the General Superintendent, who was authorised by the Board, in his discretion, to fill in the name of the convict to be returned, and to issue the warrant, without consultation with or special directions from the Board of Managers or any member thereof.

We find this method of signing warrants of arrest in blank, and empowering the General Superintendent to declare the conditions of parole violated, and to issue the warrants, if not illegal and void, is not within the spirit and intent of the statute; but that no hardship or injustice has in fact resulted from it to any man. We also find that in no case has the parole of any man paroled to employment outside the Reformatory been cancelled, and the man re-arrested and brought back to the Reformatory, except for wilful violation of his parole. We also find that in no case has any parole been cancelled, except for wilful violation of the conditions upon which the parole was granted, or upon evidence that abundantly justified the authorities in believing that the man had been guilty of such violation.

TRANSFERS TO STATE PRISON.

The statute gives the Board of Managers power, with the consent of the Superintendent of Prisons, to transfer to a State prison any convict confined in the Reformatory, 'who shall be shown to have been at the time of his conviction 'more than 30 years of age, or to have been previously convicted of crime,' or 'any apparently incorrigible prisoner 'whose presence in the Reformatory appears to be detrimental to the well-being of the institution.'

Under this provision of the statute since the opening of the Reformatory 608 have been transferred to State prison. In making such transfers, the Board of Managers act upon the recommendation of the General Superintendent. Upon the certificate of the warden of the State prison that the applicant is a worthy convict so transferred may be returned to the Reformatory, and several have been brought back under this regulation. In only one instance, a case where the convict had but 6 months to serve to complete his maximum term, has the request of a convict to be returned, accompanied by the certificate of the warden, been refused by the managers of the Reformatory. In no case does it appear that any convict has been transferred from the Reformatory to a State prison under protest. In many instances the Board of Managers have refused requests of convicts to be transferred to State prisons. As a rule, a convict does not regard his transfer to State prison as a hardship, and this fact is somewhat indicative of the character and disposition of the men transferred. Among the large number of convicts brought back from State prison to testify before us on this investigation, all without exception, of whom inquiry was made, expressed a strong desire to go back to the State prison, assigning various reasons, such as lighter labour, not so strict discipline, shorter hours, and the privilege of using tobacco.

We find that in all cases when convicts have been transferred to State prisons, such transfers have been made in conformity with the provisions of the statute relating thereto. In no case has the power to transfer convicts been abused.

LEGALITY OF THE USE OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN THE REFORMATORY.

No claim is made to the charges referred to the Governor against the managers that the use of corporal punishment in the Reformatory was prohibited by statute. Such claim was made, however, on the submission of the case before us, and argued at great length.

We do not consider that question within our province to determine. It is a pure question of law, and any expression of opinion we might give would be binding upon no one. We have no power to adjudicate that question.

As bearing upon the good faith of the managers, however, in the matter, we find as follows:—

1. That no secret has ever been made of the fact that corporal punishment was used in the Reformatory.
2. That the managers have embodied information respecting its use in their annual report to the Legislature.
3. That the State Board of Charities, in the exercise of their visitatorial powers, have been acquainted with the use of that method of punishment in the Reformatory, and have referred to it in their annual report to the Legislature.
4. That a committee of the Legislature in 1882, after an investigation of the matter, reported back to the Legislature with reference to this method of discipline in the Elmira Reformatory as follows:—We are not prepared therefore, to recommend the abolition of corporal punishment or to put our judgment in opposition to that of men who have given many years of close observation and study to the solution of this question.
5. That the Reformatory is not a State prison within the intent and meaning of that term as used in chapter 362 of the laws of 1889, which contains the provision relative to the use of corporal punishment in State prisons.

In the sixth finding, the case of The People v. Simmons, tried before the late William Murray, a Justice of the Supreme Court in Chemung County in 1891, is mentioned. Simmons killed a keeper who was trying to get him out of his cell, where he had barricaded himself. The object of getting him out was to punish him. In that case the Justice charged that punishment was legal, and the General Term—Judge Leonard presiding—agreed. The conviction of Simmons was affirmed.

7. That the managers were entirely justified in believing that the use of corporal punishment was not forbidden by statute in the Reformatory.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

The Board of Managers never by formal resolution gave any directions as to the infliction of corporal punishment, or defined the grounds upon which it might be administered. They were, however, aware, that spanking was employed by the General Superintendent as a method of punishment and discipline, and received from the Superintendent information from time to time respecting the extent to which it was resorted to and the number of blows inflicted, and they permitted and approved the same.

The spankings were administered by the General Superintendent in person, with a strap 22 inches long, 3 inches wide, and 3-16 inch thick, moistened in water so as to make it soft and pliable, invariably applied to the bare buttocks. In two or three instances, many years ago, a short piece of rubber-hose was used in place of the strap.

The records of the Reformatory enable us to submit very complete data relative to the frequency and extent of these punishments.

During the five years immediately preceding September 26, 1893, since which date that method of punishment has not been employed, the ratio of the number of spankings inflicted to the average daily convict population for each year has remained practically the same except for the year 1889, to which we have just referred.

The number of spankings, in proportion to the average daily population for each year, is as follows:—

1889.	46 spankings to 100 population.
1890.	44 spankings to 100 population.
1891.	45 spankings to 100 population.
1892.	44 spankings to 100 population.
1893.	45 spankings to 100 population.

This does not indicate, however, the number of convicts spanked inasmuch as some were spanked more than once.

During the same five years there were 3922 different convicts in the Reformatory. Of that number 1150, or 29½ per cent., at some time during the period of their confinement received one or more spankings; while 2772, or 70½ per cent., were never spanked. The total number of spankings administered—2589, aggregating 18,507 blows—were inflicted upon 1150 convicts so spanked. Of the 1150 convicts spanked, 540, or 50½ per cent. were spanked once only; while 240, or 20½ per cent. were spanked twice only; leaving 370, or 8 per cent., of the entire convict population during that period who were spanked more than twice; 137 convicts were spanked three times only, leaving 193, or less than 5 per cent., of the entire convict population during the five years, who were spanked more than three times.

Spankings have been seldom, if ever, inflicted for a single act or breach of discipline, however gross. Such punishments were resorted to, as a rule, for continued, persistent, and wilful refusal to comply with reasonable and proper regulations, after admonitions, warnings, reduction in grade, and other incentives to good conduct had failed. In 4261 instances during these five years, convicts were sent to the bathroom for interviews with the General Superintendent. In 1668 of these instances, or 39 per cent. of the entire number, a simple reproof or admonition, without corporal punishment, was sufficient, and in 2593 instances spankings were inflicted upon the 1150 convicts above mentioned. During the same period the General Superintendent sent to convicts written admonitions or warnings to the number of 18,695, of which 9529 were addressed to the 1150 convicts who were spanked.

In no case were the managers notified in advance of the intention of the General Superintendent to inflict corporal punishment upon a prisoner, nor were the number of blows inflicted determined beforehand. The Board of Managers never investigated any case where corporal punishment was to be inflicted before the infliction of the same, either as to its severity or whether it was deserved. Such matters were trusted entirely to the General Superintendent, under the impression that his judgment was a mature one, and that punishments were inflicted only because they were deserved; believing, also, that, with his personal acquaintance with the convict, and with his record and deportment in the Reformatory, such matters could be safely left to his judgment and discretion. In no instance does it appear that a prisoner has been spanked on account of his inability to accomplish his required task or to pass his examination in school.

On September 23, 1891, the General Superintendent sent for the convict Rosenthal the following communication in writing:—

'I have made a very careful inquiry into your capacity to study, having consulted Mr. Ogden and referred to your record here. I cannot reduce you in class. You will probably be permitted to remain in P. r. Unless you pass your examination now I will apply to you every month physical treatment.'

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT.

Rosenthal was not spanked after the date of this notice until May 11, 1893, when he was spanked for licentiousness.

Failure to perform tasks at labour, when believed to be intentional and wilful, have, however, entered into the causes which led up to the punishment in the bathroom. In one instance it appears that a convict (Facey) was spanked for refusing to give evidence concerning an offence in which it was believed at the time he was himself implicated, a proceeding which we find to be unjustifiable and improper.

The blows with the strap were applied with sufficient force frequently to cause redness and discoloration, but in no instance does it appear that the force and character of the blow was sufficient to break or cut the skin or to cause the blood to flow, except in one or two instances from a pimple on the buttocks, which was broken by the blow. In no case does it appear that any convict has fainted or fallen to the floor from the effects of the spanking. In no case does it appear that a convict ever received any serious or permanent injury or any injury leaving a permanent mark, as a result, directly or indirectly, of a spanking inflicted by the General Superintendent.

During the administration of the punishment by spanking it sometimes occurred that a convict would throw himself upon the floor and refuse to stand in position against the wall to receive his punishment, and in cases of persistent refusal of this kind, handcuffs were sometimes placed upon his wrists, and by means of a cord attached to the handcuffs, running over a pulley, he was raised to his feet and held in an upright position. In one or two instances while being thus raised the prisoner was for an instant lifted clear from the floor; and in no case does it appear that a prisoner was ever 'strung up' clear of the floor.

while being spanked or otherwise punished. The convict, during the process of spanking, invariably rested, or could rest, his entire weight upon his feet.

The General Superintendent occasionally inflicted slaps across the face with the strap in the bathroom because of the refusal of the prisoner to obey the injunction to keep his head turned in a certain direction, and also occasionally struck a man a slight blow over the head with the strap. In some instances these blows were of sufficient force to cause discoloured faces, bloody noses, and swollen eyes. Such occurrences were not frequent, and when a prisoner's nose was caused to bleed this result was accidental and unintentional, and the injury in all cases was temporary.

The General Superintendent did occasionally also strike a prisoner a light blow with his open hand or with his closed fist. These occasions were exceedingly rare, and the blows were of such a character as to leave no perceptible effect.

In no case does it appear that convicts were ever struck or kicked by an officer in the bathroom (except as he was struck by the General Superintendent as herein found) unless for the purpose of subduing a refractory convict, in which case only so much force was used as was reasonable and proper to accomplish that purpose. In no case does it appear that a convict was ever struck or kicked by an officer with the knowledge, consent, or approval of the General Superintendent, except in such manner and for such purposes. The rules of the institution prohibit the use of violence by officers and keepers towards prisoners except in such cases.

Assuming that it is wise and proper to employ corporal punishment in the Reformatory, we find :—

1. That the use of a strap such as has been described, moistened to the extent of rendering it soft and pliable, is a suitable and effective method; and, as appears from the evidence, the experience of the Reformatory shows that this method is free from danger of serious or permanent injury.

2. It does not appear from the evidence that the General Superintendent went beyond what the occasions required, either in the frequency or the severity of the spankings, except in the case of Paocy.

3. That it was eminently proper, as a safeguard against abuse, that punishments should have been administered by the General Superintendent personally. His intimate acquaintance with the convict character, with the convicts individually, his freedom from passion and malice, and his high sense of the responsibilities devolving upon him rendered him the suitable person to perform this duty, however repugnant to him it might be.

4. That the administration of corporal punishment without previously determining the number of blows, is in harmony with the general reformatory system of the institution. The nature and extent of the disciplinary measures used with a convict sent to the bathroom for correction depends upon the disposition which he manifests regarding his past conduct and his future course. In 39 cases out of 100, as found, a chiding, admonition, or warning was proved to be sufficient to bring about the desired effect.

5. That the occasional infliction by the General Superintendent of blows upon the head or face of convicts is not a suitable part of the system of corporal punishment, is improper, and unjustifiable on any theory.

METHOD OF DISCIPLINE USED SINCE THE SUSPENSION OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

Since September 26, 1893, spanking has not been employed in the Reformatory. The method of punishment or discipline employed in the place of spanking has been confinement in the 'seclusion' cells with mechanical restraint. The prisoners are handcuffed in a standing position to the door of the cell during the hours when the other convicts are employed in their regular duties, to wit, from 7 o'clock in the morning until 8.30 or 9 o'clock in the evening, being released once in the middle of the day to go to the closet, and at such other times as they may desire to go to the closet, having the freedom of the cell during the night. A chain connecting the handcuffs is passed round one of the upright bars of the cell door above a crossbar, which is four feet nine inches from the floor. The chain is of sufficient length to permit the convict's hands to be brought down several inches below the crossbar.

The prisoners are thus confined, not for an indefinite period, and are visited each day by an officer, and released whenever they give satisfactory evidence of a disposition to conform to the prison regulations, prisoners thus having the power to terminate the period of their confinement at any time. While thus confined, their usual diet is bread and water twice a day, consisting of five to seven ounces of bread in the morning and the same quantity at night, with all the water desired. This diet we find to have been proper and sufficient for the circumstances of each case.

OFFENCES OF FIGHTING.

During the five years immediately preceding September 26, 1893, when the use of corporal punishment in the Reformatory was suspended, 373 inmates were reported for fighting, an average of 37.3 for each period of six months during that time. During the six months immediately following the suspension of corporal punishment, 172 inmates were reported for the same offences, or more than 4½ times as many as the average number reported for that offence during the corresponding period of six months within the five preceding years.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN ITS RELATION TO REFORMATORY TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS.

Nothing can take the place of corporal punishment in the Reformatory except long confinement, with or without mechanical restraint, with low diet, loss of certain comforts and privileges, and of all opportunity for improvement and relaxation. Such persons as would render themselves subject to such punishment have a strong aversion to labour of any kind and to study. They have committed crimes largely for the reason that they are unable to do honest work. They regard society as their enemy, as they are the enemies of society. They would regard any ordinary confinement, with the ordinary diet, &c., as preferable to work in the schools and at the trades.

In our opinion, long and unusual confinement would tend to foster the ideas antagonistic to society which have led them to commit crime, and to strengthen the resistance which they naturally offer to reformatory efforts. The probabilities are that a prisoner would go out of a long period of confinement a more intractable subject rather than a better man, having lost during such confinement many valuable opportunities for improvement in education and in technical instruction, and having rendered more remote the time when he might be expected to be entitled to his release on parole. Convicts are sentenced to the Reformatory, if possible reformed; and any mode of discipline which would militate against reformation is to be avoided as far as practicable.

On the other hand, spanking is a sharp and short mode of punishment. The effect upon the prisoner is immediate. It does not interfere with his education in any way. The prisoner is put at work soon after the punishment. His mind and attention are occupied, and he is not very likely to brood long over fancied injuries and injustice.

We find that corporal punishment, under proper restriction and regulation, is preferable to other modes of punishment which must necessarily take its place if corporal punishment should be abolished.

There is no systematic examination by the physician of convicts on their admission to the Reformatory. Regular visits are not made by the physician to the convicts in 'seclusion' cells or 'rest cure.' The physician has nothing to do with the corporal punishment of convicts, as regards to propriety in individual cases from a medical point of view. Notwithstanding all this, however, in no instance, save one, does it appear from the evidence that any convict has suffered injury or injustice. Still, injury and injustice may at any time occur under the present medical organisation, which has not grown in due proportion to the development of the institution. Were the records kept in the manner we have indicated, by the physician or an assistant physician, who should reside in the Reformatory, if each convict on admission were subjected to a medical examination, such convict examined before he receives corporal punishment, the physician being present at such punishment; if daily visits were made by the physician, or an assistant physician, to each convict confined in 'seclusion' or 'rest cure' cells, no error could occur such as the one to which we now refer.

Moses M. Aaron was received at the Reformatory, April 1, 1892. On April 2, 1892, Mr. Hoppe reported to Mr. Breckway that Aaron was feigning insanity. During Aaron's stay in the Reformatory, from April 1 to September 8, 1892, he was punished repeatedly by confinement in 'seclusion' and 'rest cure' cells and with the paddle. On September 8, he was transferred to the Asylum for Insane Criminals on certificate of the physician of the Reformatory. Dr. Wey testified that he had Aaron under observation regarding his mental condition for two months before his transfer. As it appears by the testimony, the physician did not know that Aaron was punished while he was under medical observation, and the General Superintendent did not know that Aaron was in fact insane, or even that he was under observation to determine his mental condition at the time he administered corporal punishment. These facts show a want of harmony of action between the General Superintendent and the physician, which could hardly occur with a medical organisation adequate to the requirements of the institution. In this case it is evident that there was a misunderstanding or blunder between the General Superintendent, the physician, and Mr. Hoppe, who first noticed the symptoms of insanity, and who testified that he reported the fact to the Superintendent and mentioned it to the physician. We are unable to determine from the evidence whether the Superintendent or the physician, or both, are responsible for this unfortunate occurrence.

It is fair to qualify our findings, however, to some extent. It is often a question difficult to determine, even by a professional expert in insanity, whether insanity, especially in convicted criminals, is feigned or genuine. The physician may well be excused for not making a prompt diagnosis of this case. Since his appointment in 1878 many thousands of convicts have been under his observation, and this is the only instance in which a serious error is made chargeable directly or indirectly to the medical department. The General Superintendent cannot be expected to be an expert in insanity, and has often to deal with malingerers, especially those feigning insanity.

In point of fact, however, no convict has been transferred who was not insane, and no insane convict has been improperly retained in the Reformatory.

CONFINEMENT IN 'SECLUSION' AND 'REST CURE' CELLS.

The method of discipline and confinement employed by the Reformatory prior to September 26, 1893, included:—

1. Confinement in 'seclusion' cells.
2. Confinement in 'rest cure' cells.

The manner of the confinement is stated at length, and the food such prisoner received. Then the report says:—

'It does not appear that any time within the period covered by this investigation solitary confinement, according to the technical meaning of the term has been employed in the Reformatory. When confined either in 'seclusion' or 'rest-cure' cell, the convict may see through the grated door into the corridor, and communicate, when necessary, with officers and keeper.

'He is sent into such confinement for some breach of discipline or other manifestation of insubordination, not for a definite time, but is released as soon as he gives satisfactory evidence that he will conform to the requirements of the situation, and subordinate his will to the authority of the Reformatory. Each day he is visited by an officer or given some opportunity to do this, and the daily report of men in cells and the count, morning, noon, and night, shows where he is.'

In no case does it appear that a convict has been confined either in a 'seclusion' or 'rest cure' cell except for conduct in violation of the just and lawful requirements of the institution, nor does it appear that such confinement has continued beyond the time when the prisoner has given satisfactory evidence of his willingness to submit to the rules and regulations of the Reformatory.

We find that the diet of the convicts thus confined is low, as it is designed to be, but sufficient to the circumstances of each case brought to our attention.

THE CASE OF FRANK WALLACE.

Under this head, Wallace's case is described in detail. He is the prisoner who wouldn't tell the name or address of his parents, and therefore the star case of the prosecution.

USE OF THE HOT IRON.

In one instance, several years ago, a keeper of the Reformatory was attacked by a convict in his cell and killed. Thereafter, upon six or eight different occasions, when a convict had barricaded himself in his cell and armed himself with some weapon and refused to come out, a long piece of gas pipe with a curve at one end, heated red-hot, was used to compel the prisoner to come out of his cell. The bar was run through the grating and the curved end passed behind the prisoner and drawn toward the cell door, the prisoner invariably yielding without being in any manner burned by the iron. The cells were about eight feet deep, and the iron twelve feet long. The object in heating the iron was to prevent the prisoner from grasping it. Otherwise, having the advantage of the long end of the lever, it would be ineffectual for the purpose, at least without danger to the prisoner.

In no instance does it appear that a prisoner has been burned by the use of the hot iron. Such instrument has not been used for several years.

The practice of unmentionable vices did, in fact, exist to an alarming extent in the Reformatory at that time, and the facts and circumstances brought to the attention of the managers of the Reformatory abundantly justified them in believing that the several convicts found guilty by the authorities of participation in the licentious practices were in fact guilty of the same.

TREATMENT OF CONVICT WITNESSES.

The convicts who were called as witnesses in the investigation conducted by the committee of the State Board of Charities, and also those called in this investigation were assured by the Reformatory authorities that they might testify freely, and that they should not be made to suffer by reason of so testifying.

During the progress of this investigation it developed that witnesses who testified in each proceeding were not taken immediately back to the cell and employment from which they were called to testify, but were taken to cells in the 'rest cure' gallery, where they were detained for a few days, after which they were sent back to their ordinary places of confinement and duties. It does not appear that any such witness was restrained or reduced in grade, or that his standing or progress was affected in any particular by reason of the evidence he gave or refused to give.

The object of this was solely to keep the witness who had testified separate from those who were to be called upon to testify at the same hearing, in order to guard against any collusion.

Considering the remarkable ease and rapidity with which information of every kind passed among the prisoners, we deemed the precautions that were taken entirely reasonable and proper, and certainly not in any violation of the spirit of the assurance that was given.

PERMANENT INJURIES.

In no case does it appear that a convict has received any serious or permanent injury, mental or physical, at the hands of the General Superintendent or any of the subordinate officers or keepers of the Reformatory, or even an injury leaving any permanent mark.

The charges that convicts have died or been maimed from the effect of violence or neglect on the part of the officers of the Reformatory, or any of them, are unsubstantiated in every particular.

RESULTS ACCOMPLISHED.

The statements published by the managers from time to time relative to the ratio of probable reformation of paroled men is accompanied by the data and basis of calculation indicating upon their face that such statements are only estimates or probable results made from the data and upon the basis given.

The managers established that probably 31·9 of the convicts paroled prior to September 30, 1893, have been reformed. That result is arrived at by comparing the number of men paroled prior to that date, 3723, with the estimated number reformed, 3051. Compared with the whole number of indefinites discharged during the same period, 4797, whether by parole, expiration of maximum term, or any other ways, the ratio of probable reformation would be 63·6.

In the years 1887 and 1888 an effort was made to verify the estimates of probable reformation as to the 1722 prisoners who had been paroled prior to September 30, 1887. Inquiries were sent to every prison where they might possibly be or have been imprisoned, and to relatives, employers, and acquaintances of the men. Definite information was received as to 1125 of those paroled. Of that number, reliable information was received that 78·5 per cent. had not fallen into crime. A full statement of the method of prosecuting this inquiry and the results by years arrived at was published in the annual report of the Board of Managers in 1888.

CONCLUSION.

There is no evidence that the Board of Managers had any knowledge whatever that the prisoners were occasionally struck upon the face or head a light blow or slap by Mr. Brockway prior to the time when the fact was brought to their attention through the recent investigation by the committee of the State Board of Charities, since which time no such occurrence has taken place.

The members of the Board of Managers frequently visited and inspected the institution. They have stated meetings at the Reformatory every month for the transaction of ordinary business, and once in three months has a parole court. At all of these meetings prisoners have ready access to the managers, and do in fact often come before them in considerable numbers. It does not appear that any complaint was ever made to the Board by the prisoners concerning the blows over the head and face. The indignity of such blows was more serious than the physical effect.

The Board of Managers had no actual knowledge of the unfortunate circumstances connected with the iron case, nor can knowledge be imputed to them. Indeed, no one seemed to be aware of the facts in that case before the full details were brought out in the progress of this investigation.

The Elmira Reformatory is not a perfect institution in all respects, as this report indicates. There is room for improvement in some matters that could not properly be covered in this report. As it is organised and conducted, however, it is a model reformatory. Its results have been extraordinary as regards its success in the reformation of criminals. It probably stands pre-eminent among the reformatories of the world. These results are due to the unselfish devotion of the managers and the extraordinary qualities of Mr. Brockway as an organiser and executive officer, added to his intimate knowledge of the criminal character. The managers are fully justified in the confidence they have reposed in their General Superintendent. Whatever defects we have noticed, as brought out by this investigation, have in no way involved hardship or injustice to any inmate, as far as has been shown by the evidence, except in the single case of Aaron. This case is one among more than 6000 convicts who have been received at the institution since its establishment.

A very few changes not difficult to effect and involving but little additional cost would render this an ideal institution of the kind.

1. The number of inmates should never exceed the number of cells, and the number of cells should not be increased. Doubling up has evident evils to which it is unnecessary to refer. Intelligent and efficient treatment of inmates requires a close study of individual characteristics. We believe that the work of the Reformatory could be better done with a population of 600 than with 1200.

2. The Reformatory physician should have an assistant, who should reside in the Reformatory, and the medical care and supervision of inmates should be conducted on the lines indicated in the body of this report.

3. Should the administration of corporal punishment be restored, no blows should be given except on the buttocks except in self-defence or in instances of violent resistance. Very respectfully submitted.

'AUSTIN FLINT,
'ISRAEL T. DEYO, } Commissioners.'

Dated Dec. 7. 1894.

MINORITY REPORT.

JUDGE LEARNED THINKS PUNISHMENTS WERE EXCESSIVE, THEREFORE CRUEL.

While in his conclusion Ex-Judge Learned differs with Dr. Flint and Mr. Deyo, he agrees with them in declaring the maliciousness and wickedness of nearly all the allegations brought by the New York World. He declares, particularly with regard to blows on the kidneys: 'The statements by witnesses that they were struck on the kidneys seem to have been made through ignorance of the location of those organs.'

THE LAW AT FAULT.

In the first part of the decision Judge Learned devotes a good deal of time to objecting to various things in the Reformatory system, such as the indeterminate sentence and the parole systems. Then he says:—

'Whoever drafted the statute in 1887 seems to have intended to put the Superintendent as firmly as possible in possession of his office, so long as he had the good will of the managers, for they seem to be made the tribunal to hear charges against him. It might be a serious question how far their decision on such charges, however palpably erroneous, would be evidence of misconduct, incompetency, or neglect of duty. But that is not for us to determine, for the managers have taken no action whatever in regard to the Superintendent tending to an examination of the charges. On the contrary, they have, at least in a general way, known of his conduct in the matters complained of, and they justify and uphold him, and have always done so.'

The report then sets forth the duties of the Board of Managers, and alleges that those duties have illegally been transferred to the Superintendent. It says:—

'The Board of Managers have had the utmost confidence in Mr. Brockway. They have accepted his plans and have approved of his mode of conducting the Reformatory. Nothing which has been shown has shaken their confidence.'

Then the fact that the Board depends largely on Mr. Brockway's advice in granting parols is stated, with this conclusion:—

'I have no reason to think that the Superintendent has ever intentionally abused this power. But the statute gives the authority to retake to the Board, not to the Superintendent.'

The report also cites as instances where power has been delegated to the Superintendent the transfer to State prison system and the transfer to insane asylum system. 'The evil,' it says, 'of thus neglecting to exercise the authority given to the Board in all these cases is that Mr. Brockway has been made practically absolute.'

The transfer to State prison system, which is provided for by law, is attacked, and then it is asserted that it was the duty of the Board of Managers to prescribe regulations under which corporal punishment should be inflicted, and, because it didn't, the report says the Board was negligent in its duty. The subject of corporal punishment is discussed at length, and it is concluded that any sort of corporal punishment is illegal whether or not the law fails particularly to specify the Reformatory when it forbids it in State prisons.

NO PERMANENT INJURIES.

The system of keeping records in vogue in the institution is complimented, and then the report says:—

'The proof presented has not showed satisfactorily that in any case a prisoner has ever been permanently injured by a flogging in the Reformatory. Men have claimed that eyesight and hearing have been made defective by their cause, and rupture produced. Very possibly these claims have been made in good faith, for the rupture, or the defective eyesight, or defective hearing existed. But they have not been caused by the flogging. Nor do I think that any teeth were broken out by blows of the Superintendent's fist, or scars of any magnitude made by his punishments, either by the blows of the strap or by the handcuffs. A charge is made that the Superintendent was frequently profane in language towards prisoners. The evidence is conflicting. Some witnesses testify as to language unquestionably profane. Others say that, having many opportunities to hear him talk, they never heard such language. The Superintendent himself says that he addressed to the prisoner the word "damn." It is not necessary to inquire whether the use of the word would have been a violation of the statute against profane swearing as it existed. Its use is ordinarily considered to be profanity. And use of such a word is a bad example in one working as a reformer, especially as on the chocolate, or first-class report, profanity is named as one of the offences. The example of the Superintendent is naturally followed by some of the officers under him. Officers should not be allowed to "damn" any prisoner.'

The inmate monitor system is condemned on the ground that it permits one class of convicts to inflict abuse and injustice on another class.

There is then a long description of the corporal punishment practised at the Reformatory, and an argument is made and testimony quoted at length to show that it is painful. There are also descriptions of assaults which occurred in the bath-room, and the testimony of the witnesses of the prosecution is cited in support of the charge of cruelty. The paddle is described, so are the slaps over the head. As to Mr. Brockway's testimony that punishments are not punitive, it is disputed. The subject of punishments is then divided under three heads. First, punishments inflicted to compel confession and testimony; second, punishments inflicted on insane convicts; third, other punishments as to their frequency and severity.

WALLACE AND FACEY CASES.

Under the first head the cases of Wallace and the pervert Facey are discussed. There was no law, the report says, compelling Wallace to give the names of his parents.

'One may give Mr. Brockway credit for sincerity in the belief that it would be good for Wallace to do exactly what Mr. Brockway wished. But that is no justification for such cruel confinement.'

Regarding Facey's case, the report says:—

'Now, whatever may be thought of the propriety of compelling by corporal punishment the prisoner to tell of the crimes of others, it is manifest that to compel him by such punishment to confess his own crime is wrong and unjust.'

Under the second head, the case of Aaron is discussed in the same tenor as in the majority report. There are two other cases mentioned.

Under the third head it is asserted that the act of punishing a person does brutalise the person who inflicts the punishment, and testimony that Mr. Brockway gave in 1882 is quoted. It is concluded :—

'It seems to me that a system that can only be carried on successfully by one person (or possibly a few whom he could designate) is not one which should exist in this institution.'

Tables follow this showing the number of punishments and the blows, and then confinement in 'seclusion' cells and in 'rest cure' are discussed unfavourably :—

'In considering the question of cruelty,' says the report toward the end, 'it might be unreasonable simply to take up particular cases. The superintendent of such an institution might well be excused if in any one or two instances he should misjudge, and should inflict severer punishments than the circumstances justified. One must take the whole course of dealings during the time investigated, and say whether the punishments were or were not too frequent or too severe. Looking at all the facts, I feel satisfied that the punishments have been excessive in number, and in severity, and therefore have been cruel.'

The report concludes :—

'I have no doubt that Mr. Brockway is sincere, and that he acts as he thinks is for the good of the inmates. But not infrequently men with good intentions and with good motives take cruel means to accomplish their objects. History is full of such instances. Knowing that their motives are good, and believing that the objects aimed at are desirable, they think, as is said, that the end justifies the means. Especially is this so when they are placed beyond the restraint of public opinion. "No man," says a recent writer, "can be raised above the authority of law and opinion without developing into inclemency and presumption."

'It now remains with you, the Governor, to say whether these punishments shall continue.'

APPENDIX LXII.

REPORT by the Committee of the School Board of the Burgh of Wick and Pulteneytown, appointed to inquire and report as to the measures which may be available to the Board for the purpose of bringing Tinker Children within the compulsory provisions of the Education Acts, or, in the absence of any statutory provisions in the matter, what measures should be recommended for the education of these children.

Remit dated 14th August 1894.

COMMITTEE.

JOHN DUNNET, Esq., Mill Manager, Wick, Convener.
HECTOR SUTHERLAND, Esq., Town Clerk, Wick.
JAMES EDWARD HARPER, Esq., Auctioneer, &c., Wick.

The Committee, after careful consideration of the subject of the remit, is satisfied that, under the existing provisions of the Education statutes, School Boards are powerless to bring the children of vagrant tinkers under the compulsory provisions of these statutes. The Committee, in course of its deliberations, thought it expedient to address the Secretary for Scotland on the subject, and a copy of the Clerk's letter to Sir George Trevelyan, and of the reply thereto, will be found in the Appendix to this Report.

The numbers of tinkers who habitually frequent the county, and who may be said to make it their 'domicile,' is about 130, of whom there are about 30 adult males and the same number of adult females. From statistics which have been obtained by the Committee through the kindness of the Chief-Constable, it would appear that, as at the end of 1894, there were 26 children under five years of age, and 43 of school age. The above numbers are, however, often increased principally during the summer season, by families of tinkers from other counties. All these tinkers form a distinct and exclusive class or community by themselves, and they recruit their numbers by inter-marriage within their own caste only. The families who may be said to be more or less indigenous to Caithness wander about from place to place, living in rock-caves, or camping in secluded or sheltered places near the sea-coast or in the open country, so that it is, under the existing provisions of the Education Acts, impossible for any district or parish School Board to fix a tinker parent with the necessary legal domicile to found jurisdiction over him.

While this defect in the statutes sufficiently enables tinker parents to elude the compulsory clauses, and makes School Boards helpless to compel provision for the education of the tinker children, there are other grave difficulties which the School Boards of landward parishes and small burghal districts would have to contend with in providing for the education of these children, assuming that Boards had the jurisdiction to enforce the compulsory provisions of the statutes. Perhaps the chief of these difficulties would be one of finance in erecting and maintaining a proper institution for the reception, maintenance, and education of the children. After much careful and anxious consideration, the Committee is strongly of opinion that, owing to the very low social status and intercourse of the tinker families, their filthy habits, and the total want of what may be termed proper up-bringing for their children, resulting from the absence of anything in the shape of a home or home-comforts, in any sense of the term, the common public school would be quite unsuited for meeting the educational requirements of these children, even were it prudent or right—which is certainly not obvious—to mix these children with the other pupils of our public schools.

Through the kindness of Dr. Sutherland, Secretary of the Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, &c., the Committee has been favoured with a copy of the evidence given before that Committee by a deputation from the Perthshire Committee on Vagrancy; and it is to be observed that the Perthshire Committee recommended the institution of Homes for the reception of tinkers, and that the cost of these Homes should be defrayed out of the county rates. Your Committee, however, after maturely considering the probable working of such a scheme, has, in view of the hereditary nomadic habits of the tinker community, especially in the adult man and woman, serious doubt that the scheme would result in supplying the remedy for which it is extended, and which is so much desiderated. But to meet the educational wants of the children, as well as to secure a reform in the social and moral habits of the adult tinker, your Committee is of opinion that such institutions as Homes would not meet the necessities of the case. Of course your Committee is only concerned with the educational aspect of the question in so far as it affects the youthful tinker of school age, but it requires no argument to demonstrate that, if an effectual remedy of the present state of matters—that is, the whole question of the reformation or naturalisation of the entire tinker class, and their assimilation or absorption among the ranks of the general community,—the training and educational development of the young should be the first consideration. After due consideration of the different aspects of the question, your Committee is convinced that perhaps the only method of overcoming the difficulties in the way of providing education and a better moral training for these tinker children, is by the establishment of an Industrial School under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, for the whole county of Caithness, in which the tinker children of school age could be housed, maintained, and educated. Perhaps one such school might be sufficient for the wants of the counties of Ross, Sutherland, Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland, and if one school were to be provided for these counties your Committee would suggest that it should be situated in Caithness as being the most central, while, at the same time, it is believed that the number of tinkers who frequent it is considerably larger than in the other counties named. There is no good reason, so far as the Committee can see, why any part of the cost connected with such an institution, in so far as the moral reclamation of these children is concerned, should be borne by the local rates. The tinker community is composed of a tribe or family quite alien to the local population, among whom they do not mix in social life or intercourse, neither work nor help in any way to alleviate the burden of local taxation, but by their mode of life, their obscene ways and conversation, their squalor and drunken habits, are a menace to our very civilisation. The Committee is therefore very clearly of opinion that the cost of such an institution as is desiderated should be defrayed from the public purse of the Imperial Exchequer.

Further, the Committee would suggest that, if such a scheme were adopted, power should be given to School Boards, or their officers, as well as all police officers, to take possession of all these tinker children of school age where the parents cannot at once show that they are possessed of the facilities of providing for the housing and education of their children. Without such powers your Committee gravely doubt the successful working of the scheme which is recommended.

APPENDIX TO ABOVE REPORT.

COPY LETTER by Mr D. W. Georgeson, Clerk to the Wick (Burgh) School Board, Wick, to Sir George Trevelyan, Secretary for Scotland, dated 13th September 1894.

EDUCATION OF TINKER CHILDREN.

SIR,—The Wick School Board have had before them the matter of the education of the tinker children who frequently come within the district of the Board, and live or camp in the vicinity of the town. A considerable number of tinker families wander about the county of Caithness and adjoining counties. Sometimes they live in caves in the rocks, immediately beyond the boundary of the district of the Board, and, at other times camp in the fields adjoining the town. They seldom live in any one locality for any length of time; and hence the School Board have experienced difficulty in bringing the children within the compulsory clauses of the Education Acts.

Tinker children are constantly wandering about the streets of the town, and their conduct and conversation are often such as must have a demoralising effect upon other young children who may come in contact with them.

While the School Board are most anxious that those tinker children should be educated, and, by this means, that their moral tone should be improved, it seems that in present circumstances the Board are powerless to do anything in the matter.

I have been directed by the Board to bring the facts under your notice, in order to ascertain if you can suggest or do anything with the object of helping the Board, and other School Boards who are placed in a similar position, to reach those tinker children, so that the compulsory clauses of the Education Acts may be put in force against them.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) DAN. W. GEORGESON,
Clerk.

SIR,—Adverting to your letter of the 13th instant, I am directed to state that my Lords fear that, without the aid of fresh legislation, School Boards can do little or nothing in the way of putting in force the compulsory clauses of the Education Acts in the case of wandering tinker children, inasmuch as under these Acts the Local Authority can only proceed against parents who are resident within their district.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

SWITZERLAND.

SUMMARY OF LAWS IN FORCE IN SWITZERLAND WITH REGARD TO THE TREATMENT OF INEBRIATES. By Dr J. F. SUTHERLAND.

The Laws and Regulations of 13 Cantons of Switzerland and their sub-divisions with regard to the Treatment of Inebriates.

These Laws and Regulations seem to differ little from each other in their essential points, and may be looked upon in principle as effective measures against intemperance by affording sufficient powers to the agents of the law in repressing the evil in question, for not only are those persons who indulge in strong drinks to excess liable to fine or imprisonment, and subject in some localities, when such indulgence is persisted in, to confinement for many months in a home for inebriates, such as that described at length under the heading of Zurich; but considerable responsibility is incurred by publicans who supply strong drinks knowingly to persons under age, to those already intoxicated, or who are by reason of their habitual intemperance forbidden to enter taverns.

I.—ZURICH.

Rules for the Elkhon Home for Inebriates.

For reception into the retreat there is required—

1. A written agreement to remain in the institute for a definite time, to be fixed by the president of the committee of administration, in special cases by the principal of the establishment (Hausvater), and to submit to the rules and regulations of the said principal. The duration of stay agreed upon must, as a rule, not be less than 4 months. Only in quite peculiar cases may an agreement for 3 months be granted. In the case of wards, and persons in receipt of charity, the agreement of the inebriate can be replaced by that of his legal representative.
2. A previous certificate from a medical witness testifying that the person in question is not insane, and in which the cause or the habit and the general circumstances of the said person are clearly shown forth.
3. Production of certificate of place of origin (Heimatschein).
4. Payment of caution money for cost of residence for first quarter, or satisfactory guarantee for same. Extra costs must also be previously covered.

The cost of maintenance is generally reckoned to the day of leaving the institute. The caution money is not returned in any part, when—

- (a) The inmate quits the institute before expiry of first quarter;
- (b) Or quits the institute without the consent of the principal of the institute and the president of the committee of administration before expiration of course of treatment;
- (c) Or is expelled.

The main principle for the treatment of inebriety is complete abstinence—that is, entire abstinence from all alcoholic drinks.

Accordingly the principal, his family, and the entire staff must abstain from all spirituous liquors, so that in the whole house no mischievous example may be set to the inmates.

The institute will therefore form a temperance community, whose members shall set before themselves the ideal and moral duty of zealously fostering and spreading this moral reform amongst inebriates.

In the practical work of the moral elevation of the inmates of the institute each must, without exception, take his part according to the measure and character of his capacities. In work, of whatever kind it may be, lie the best means of strengthening his bodily and spiritual powers, above all his weakened will and character. The work accomplished by the inmates falls to the profit of the institution.

The medical supervision is given by the committee of administration to two doctors, each of whom must visit the institute at least once in every 4 months.

If an inmate becomes deranged, the principal shall at once communicate by telegraph with the relatives or responsible parties, and at the same time bring the matter to the cognisance of one of the visiting physicians, so that the patient may as soon as possible be placed in an asylum.

As a rule no inmate may leave the institute during the first 3 months, not even with relations or guardians. Later on, permission to go out is granted by the principal according to the circumstances and condition of the inmate. When such permission is given, the person concerned is to keep within the time allotted.

The principal cause of cases of relapse, of which we have still to complain, is the short time the patients stay in the institution. It generally needs some months before an alcoholic subject has so far recovered that he has a true insight into his circumstances and shows nothing morbid in his train of thoughts. A much longer time is needed before the patient's character and will is sufficiently strengthened that one can confidently trust him to the trials and temptations of social life. The average term of 5½ months in the case of patients who have been discharged this year is therefore too short: in most cases the duration of cure should last 12 months.

In some Cantons, as for examples Zurich and St Gall, the profits from the alcohol tenth are devoted to defraying the cost of maintenance, but many individuals and Communes are ignorant of this, and many applications fail to be made which, where the State would assist in bearing the expense, would lead to the patient being admitted and cured.

The State should not only, under certain circumstances, bear the entire cost of maintenance, but, when necessary, support the family during the absence of the bread-winner, and in such a way that the support should not assume the character of charity.

II.—BERNE.

When persons receiving poor law relief are knowingly helped to gamble or drink, the person so offending can be punished with 60 days' hard labour. Persons of drunken and dissolute life may be forbidden from access to public-houses for a years from date of prosecution, or punished by deprivation of parental rights.

Persons who abandon themselves to an idle, drunken, or disorderly life, and in consequence thereof come upon the poor-law relief, or become a source of annoyance to the public, shall be liable to detention in the house of correction for a space of one year.

III.—URL.

No licences shall be granted to innkeepers who have allowed drunkenness, gambling, receiving stolen property or immorality.

It is forbidden to vend spirituous liquors to drunken persons; any innkeeper who gives a customer so much to drink that he becomes unconscious, or is incapable of walking, is under the obligation of supplying him with lodgings for the night without any compensation, and shall moreover be punished. (Art. 19.)

IV.—GLARUS.

It is forbidden to deliver spirituous liquors—

- (a) To persons who are already intoxicated.
- (b) To young persons under 16, when not accompanied by parents or guardians.
- (c) To such persons as are forbidden to have access to public houses.

V.—FRIBOURG.

Shall be punished with the house of correction for a term not exceeding 3 months, and with interdiction from public-houses for at least 3 years, any person who abandons himself to gambling, drunkenness, or idleness to such a degree as to become a burden on the public maintenance, or to allow those dependent on him to become such a burden.

These penalties may be increased by confinement to the Commune for a term not exceeding 6 years.

Law of September 28, 1888, concerning Inns.

Any individual found in a state of drunkenness in a public place shall be taken to the nearest police station. He can be condemned to a fine of £2, or to a term of imprisonment not exceeding 15 days.

When the offence is several times repeated, the prefect can, as a measure of discipline, pronounce his interdiction from public-houses for one year or less. This interdiction does not involve the forfeiture of political rights.

Persons who abandon themselves habitually to drink, may by a measure of the administration be confined in a house of correction ("Maison de travail").

Penalties shall be doubled in cases where the offence is repeated.

VI.—BALE-VILLE.

Law concerning the Administration of Work or Reformatory Institutes, February 7, 1854.

There may be placed in such institutes citizens of the Canton Bale-Ville, who, through dissolute conduct and behaviour, especially through drunkenness and a disorderly manner of life, become a public nuisance, who can give no guarantee for the maintenance of order, discipline, and public security either through themselves or through their families, and can only be kept in an orderly manner of life by compulsion.

VII.—ST GALL.

Law concerning the Treatment of Habitual Drunkards, May 21, 1891.

The Grand Council of the Canton of St Gall,—

In consideration of the need of establishing measures of legal prevention against alcoholism, and in execution of Art. 12 of the Statutes of November 16, 1890,

Ordains that: Persons who habitually abandon themselves to drunkenness can be placed in an institution for inebriates.

Art. 2. The duration of their stay in the said institution shall be, as a rule, from 9 to 18 months. In cases of relapse the term shall be correspondingly prolonged.

Confinement in such an institution shall ensue—

(a) By voluntary application.

In so far as, according to Art. 7, the costs of maintenance are to be defrayed by poor relief, the declaration of the Communal Council requires the assent of the poor-law authorities concerned.

The Communal Council shall decide as to the transfer of a patient into such an institute, whether the initiative come from themselves or from other authorities, or from a relation or guardian.

Transfer into the institute can only be decided on the ground of a medical certificate establishing the fact of alcoholism, and that residence in this institute is necessary for its cure.

Art. 6. The declaration of the Communal Council is to be conveyed to the parties concerned by the district board for justification, and in every case it requires to be confirmed by the Council of State.

(a) The Council of State is also authorised to decree by itself the entrance of a patient whose transfer is imperatively necessary where the Communal authorities refuse to act.

The costs of treatment in an Institute for Inebriates shall be defrayed out of the patient's own means. If he is without resources, or the costs of treatment are too heavy for his family to incur, they shall be levied on the poor rates in accordance with the existing legal prescriptions. Where it appears necessary, the State shall contribute to the cost of maintenance in the institute, and in exceptional cases a proportionate sum for the maintenance of his family during the time of the patient's treatment.

One month before expiry of the course of treatment the managers of the institute shall furnish a report to those authorities who committed the patient to their care, and if the cure is not yet complete it can be prolonged within the limits of the time established in Art. 2.

During the time of treatment a temporary guardian can be appointed to represent the patient concerned. The same can be done even before transfer into the institute, as soon as a serious weakness of will consequent on an excessive use of alcohol is proved to exist by medical certificate.

VIII.—GRISONS.

Poor Law Regulations of the Canton Grisons, 1867.

The house of correction called Realta is intended to put persons who are sent there into the way of reform and self-control, and to make them useful members of their family and community, or, if they are incorrigible, at least to render them incapable of doing further mischief.

The Grand Council of the Canton Grisons to the Departments and Communes.

A further regulation deals with the employment of the tenth of the alcohol monopoly. According to a federal law dealing with the alcohol monopoly, the cantons are required to employ at least one-tenth of the profits accruing from this monopoly for combatting alcoholism in its causes and effects. After the Grand Council had first devoted one-half of this cantonal profit to the expenses of the asylum for lunatics now being built, the smaller Council, in their provisions for spending the other half of the profit, created a special commission which laid before the authorities a project of administration. The latter was somewhat simplified by the Standing Committee and Grand Council, and constituted as follows:—

Two-tenths shall be devoted to the reformation of pauper inebriates, especially in placing them in suitable institutions;

Seven-tenths to the shelter and maintenance of the children of inebriates, and other destitute or weak-minded children of poor parents; and

One-tenth to forward the efforts made in the Communes for improving popular cookery, education, and the supply of natural necessities.

These objects scarcely need any further explanation. The first two objects tend directly to the required aim, the third one not so directly. It endeavours to combat alcoholism in its causes. In the case of pauper inebriates these causes lie not unfrequently in bad nourishment and in the want of elevating and instructive social intercourse, and therefore it is demonstrated that State help should work also in this direction.

It is indeed quite true that the half of the profit of the alcohol tenth could find beneficent and appropriate uses in other directions; but considering the smallness of the sum which is at present to be disposed of, it seemed desirable not to break it up too much.

IX.—THURGOVIE.

The tenth share of the profits of the alcohol monopoly for the Canton of Thurgovie, which last year amounted to the sum of 18,000 fr., was chiefly employed on the following objects:—

(a) As contribution towards the expenses of an out-cantonal inebriates' institute, and of an asylum for boys and girls without guardians, created voluntarily in Thurgovie (2,000 fr.).

(b) For assistance in kind to passing travellers (5,000 fr.).

(c) For the care and control of young offenders (Budget, 1,000 fr.).

(d) To defray part of the costs of maintenance of victims to alcoholism in the house of correction at Kalchrain, and in the lunatic asylum, as also those of young persons without natural protectors (6,300 fr.).

(e) For the cantonal education of poor children (1,000 fr.).

(f) For an orphanage (500 fr.).

(g) For popular kitchens and canteens, for societies to advance economy, and the education of children of weak intellect (2,200 fr.).

X.—VAUD.

Persons who are habitually maintained by the public, as well as parents whose children have been withdrawn from their charge by the judicial authorities, may be forbidden to frequent places intended for the sale and consumption of spirituous liquors. This prohibition is pronounced by the police tribunal. This prohibition shall take effect for a term of not less than 1 year, and not more than 4 years. Where such prohibition is disregarded, the tribunal can order confinement in a penal colony.

XI.—VALAIS.

No action can be sustained in a court of justice for credit given for the retail sale of wine or other liquors. This law does not apply to persons stopping at hotels or inns.

XII.—NEUCHÂTEL.

Any persons who abandon themselves habitually to drunkenness, or who cause a public scandal through being in a state of intoxication, shall be taken to the prefecture of the district and warned. In case of a new infraction of the law within 12 months, the penalty shall be 15 days' imprisonment in a civil prison. In the case of a repetition of the offence within the same period, the penalty shall be 3 months' imprisonment, or seclusion for a period of 1 year to 3 years in a house of correction and hard labour.

XIII.—GENEVA.

Confinement in an institution for inebriates has for its object to cure the persons concerned of drunkenness and its effects. Persons who, in consequence of drunkenness, become a burden on the public maintenance, or cause public disorder, can be placed in a house of correction.

Persons who, through habitual drunkenness, cause public annoyance, squander their means, or openly suffer mental and bodily harm which incapacitates them from business, can be placed in an institute for inebriates without their own consent. The duration of their term of confinement shall generally amount to 18 months; this term can be doubled in case of relapse. The poor-law authorities can come to an agreement with the Council of State as to placing any person in one of the above-named institutes.

Application for the same may be made by a third party directly to the Council of State; or

The said Council may act directly of its own initiative.

APPENDIX LXXI.

MEMORANDUM on the Laws and the Institutions, in the United States and the Colonies, for dealing with Crime, Vagrancy, and Inebriety. By Dr J. F. SUTHERLAND.

NORTH CAROLINA.

REPORT OF THE STATE HOSPITAL, MORGANTON.

The General Assembly of North Carolina for 1891 permitted the Hospital to admit inebriates under certain restrictions.

An inebriate, as defined by the statute, is 'one who habitually or periodically indulges in intoxicating liquors or other narcotics to such an extent as to stupefy his mind and to render him incompetent to transact ordinary business with safety to his estate,' provided the habit shall have been 'at the time of inquisition of at least one year's standing.'

This includes, as is seen, those who indulge in opium and its preparations, as well as other drugs of like character.

Eighteen persons under above statute were admitted—nine alcoholic and nine opium inebriates. Of the number discharged cured five—two alcoholic and three opium inebriates—remain well; five returned to the habit, and of the remaining, two were lost sight of and four remain under treatment. The deductions to be drawn from these statistics are clearly set forth and need no further comment.

Even before the trial was made, it was thought that this was not a proper place for the treatment of this class. Time and experience convinced the authorities of the correctness of that position. They interfere with proper discipline, and are troublesome in a variety of ways. It is deemed, however, advisable to have the privilege of admitting certain ones of these cases, and hence the law has been allowed to remain as it is. There are some of these persons who cannot very well be treated elsewhere, and who are a menace to society and ought to be confined, and yet are not insane.

NEW YORK STATE.

ELMIRA REFORMATORY.

The Reformatory at Elmira, N.Y., of which Mr Z. R. Brockway took charge in 1876, and which, to a great extent, is of his creation, is the best known and in many respects the most remarkable of American institutions of this class.

It differs from the other prisons of the State in the selection of a special class of prisoners to be treated, viz.: Males to the exclusion of females; felons to the exclusion of misdemeanants and men supposed to be first offenders in felony although they might have been in a house of refuge, or guilty of a misdemeanour. They must be between sixteen and thirty years of age. Then as to the men sent to the Reformatory the judge does not determine or name the periods of their detention. The law fixes the maximum and the minimum penalty that may be imposed for each offence. In other cases the judges determine what the penalty within these limits shall be, but not when a prisoner is sent to this Reformatory. In regard to this Institution Mr Brockway states:—'Another difference is in the system of treatment which has been termed the disciplinary system and which is based upon the system of indeterminate sentences. There is a marking system under which the most minute record is kept of a man's performances and progress and demeanour and industry, instructive or productive, as the case may be, and of his mental growth indicated by his work at the schools. . . . The next distinguishing feature is in the efforts made for the education of the men here—in the schools. Every inmate upon admission is assigned to his appropriate place in the grade's school; and is assigned school tasks under competent teachers who instruct him under the oral system. The prisoner is subjected to monthly written examinations and a failure to obtain the minimum percentage required, involves loss of time, as does failure in demeanour, or in the trade-school examination; or properly, in the industrial results. Latterly, a difference had come to exist, because of the military government of the whole place and the organising of the inmates into a regiment with a complete complement of officers. Out of this had come a new disciplinary government in which inmates of the advanced grades placed under parole are appointed monitors and overseers in place of citizens previously employed. Another distinguishing feature is the instruction given in trades. Every man on his admission is assigned to some mechanical instruction, as well as to a place in the school. A careful inquiry is made into the natural adaptation of each man for some particular place in the world's work, as to his possible introduction into an industry upon his release, as to the employment of near relatives and as to the general class of industry carried on in the community to which he would probably go. Here the prisoner proceeds upon a formulated outline, each trade having several subdivisions and a number of lessons assigned to each. Failure to pass monthly examinations in these results in loss of time. The newest feature that distinguishes this Reformatory is the attention given to the physical training of defectives with a view to bringing about a better mental state and capacity in the expectation of course that broad scientific treatment based upon better physical condition is the vehicle for instructive moral impulse. For this a building and apparatus have been provided on ground measuring 80 feet by 140 feet, with Turkish bath, plunge bath, and a complete apparatus for a gymnastium. This is no mere amusement for the inmates, but is a complete system of scientific renovation for those who may need it. It ought to be stated for the sake of emphasising the difference between this and other institutions, that this Reformatory deals with a selected class of inmates on the so-called indeterminate sentence system from an educational and disciplinary point of view, and it is distinguished from the average prison in the most important particular, that under the law of discipline the matter of retribution is left out and the whole treatment of the prisoner is remedial. We have at the present time considerably over a thousand inmates.'

Of the young felons committed 95 per cent. have no knowledge of a trade. But the trade school, during two years' confinement, gives them the necessary equipment, and it is claimed that 78 per cent. are able to secure employment—in many cases at the trade rate of wages.

Of the 3723 paroled during the 17 years of the system 259, or 7 per cent., were returned to the Reformatory, of which number 110 were paroled a second, and 10 a third time. The right to return the prisoner to closer custody is conferred with his first committal. The managers claim that 80 per cent. of those paroled are reformed, and turn out good citizens. This stated ratio based on the best information, was verified by an enaminative correspondence and inquiry made in 1887.

MASSACHUSETTS.

The Massachusetts State Reformatory for men is managed on somewhat different principles. All prisoners sent to it are under indeterminate sentence. Any man guilty of an offence bringing him within the provisions of the statute may be sent to this Reformatory by any court or magistrate of the State, and persons sentenced to other prisons may be removed to this by order of the Commissioners of Prisons. Two classes of offenders are admitted to this institution—misdemeanants, that is those convicted of drunkenness, idleness, vagrancy or stubbornness, who may be held for two years; and felons, including those convicted of larceny, embezzlement and other serious crimes, who may be held for five years.

The prolonged imprisonment usually has a good effect on those committed for drunkenness. A man may be committed for drunkenness on a third conviction, or if any one will swear that he has seen the man drunk three or four times within a year.

A peculiar feature of this institution is the societies which the men are allowed to organise, choosing their own officers and conducting their proceedings without the presence of the officers of the institution. Frequently as many as 300 men meet without an officer except those chosen by themselves. They hold interesting discussions and preserve excellent order. One is a Young Men's Christian Association, which was begun as an experiment, and which now carries on work of a religious character. Then the Catholics formed a religious society of their own. They had a literary and scientific society, a Chatauqua, a temperance and other societies, all meeting on different evenings of the week and all doing manifest good.

The conditions under which Mr Tufts works are much less favourable to the production of striking results than those under which the Elmira Reformatory is conducted. The limitations of age are not the same. At Elmira all are convicted for the first time; at Concord several have been more than two or three times convicted. At Elmira the maximum term is in all cases long, and the average length of imprisonment was 20 months in 1889. At Concord many of the inmates are misdemeanants whose maximum term is but two years, and the average term is comparatively short; and a large proportion of the inmates of the Concord institution are habitual drunkards. It is to be expected therefore that there should not be the same appearance of strict discipline at Concord, and that the recidivists there should be numerous. Some think it a fault in Mr Tufts' administration that he treats those committed to his care with a kindness that is almost indulgence.

Other States have followed the example of New York and Massachusetts in providing Reformatories for men. Ohio, although the parole system was introduced in her State prison five or six years ago, is now erecting at Mansfield a large and handsome building to be managed nearly on the principle of the Elmira Reformatory.

INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

In the United States the system of indeterminate sentence and parole combined is regarded as absolutely essential to the successful management of a Reformatory. Juveniles who commit offences of a certain gravity become wards of the State and remain under the guardianship and control of the State Board appointed for the purpose, until they have attained their majority or have given satisfactory evidence of their ability to take care of themselves. Adults placed in a Reformatory are enabled and encouraged to earn their release absolute or on parole, by good conduct and attention to and proficiency in work and study.

THE MASSACHUSETTS LAWS.

The laws of Massachusetts provide that complaint may be heard against any boy or girl between the ages of seven and seventeen, but no court or magistrate shall commit any child under twelve years of age to a gaol or house of correction, to the house of industry of the city of Boston or to the State workhouse in default of bail or for non-payment of fine and costs, but to the custody of the State Board of Lunacy and Charities. They provide also that police, district and municipal courts shall try juvenile offenders separate and apart from the trial of other criminal cases at suitable times to be designated therefor by said Courts, to be called the 'session for juvenile offenders, of which session a separate record and docket shall be kept.'

The agent of the board, or the probation officer as he is generally called, makes careful enquiry into the circumstances of the case, and the condition and character of the child and the character of its parents, and if the charges made be proved, the court is usually guided by the advice of the officer. If the parents are not dissolute or of bad character generally, the child is usually placed on probation with them, with the understanding that strict watch will be kept, and if they fail in their duty, or the child prove uncontrollable, he will be taken from them and placed elsewhere or sent to an institution. If the officer report that the parents are unfit to take charge of the child, the board is authorised to place him with respectable persons willing to receive him on the terms prescribed by law and by the regulations of the board. Only when the child has committed some serious offence or is known to be of depraved habits is he sent to the Reformatory or Industrial School, at Westborough.

THE MASSACHUSETTS INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

The trustees regard this institution as highly successful, and speak of an increase in the number of communities as evidence of a growing belief in the value of the institution for girls of the class sent there. 'The placing out of these girls all over the State,' they say, 'with the good accruing both to the girls themselves and to the little communities that secure domestic service of such good character, has tended to call attention to the school and its work. A work which has transformed many girls who, a few months before, were idle, disorderly and sometimes disreputable, and who lived in thriftless and wretched homes, into neat, strong, industrious and willing, if not always skilful, helpers in respectable families, must have some merit and some efficient force and motive.' They claim that the industrial training is thorough, and that the girls learn to do much of the farm work as well as what is domestic. They reply to a complaint that the girls are kept in the school too long by stating that it is necessary to keep them from their old associations until they have acquired moral strength to withstand them all, and by asserting that no girl is retained in the school whose condition would be better outside. The superintendent reports that the demand for girls is greater than can be supplied, although seventy-nine had been placed out that year. The tabulated statements are not so favourable. The number in the school on September 30th, 1888, was sixty-three. During the year following there were seventy-three new commitments, and of those previously placed out six were sent back for illness, six in order to change their places, fifteen for unsatisfactory conduct, two for theft, three for serious immorality, five for having eloped from their places, and two from prison.

They also say, 'The feeble-minded girls still constitute a most perplexing element in the school. Some of them the trustees have discharged as unfit subjects, for the training is too expensive to give to those whom it cannot permanently benefit. But girls who are unfit for the school are still more unfit to be turned loose to pollute the community and to propagate a tainted offspring; and the trustees earnestly renew their recommendations that a custodial asylum, like that in the State of New York, be established where these unfortunates may be decently and economically cared for.'

DRUNKENNESS.

The total number sent to the Boston House of Industry during the year 1889 for offences of all kinds punishable by imprisonment in that institution was 13,749. Of these 44 were committed as habitual drunkards and 11,958 others on charges of drunkenness. One of those convicted as a common drunkard was committed 18 times. But of those not so classed many were committed more frequently. 1006 were committed a third time; 724 a fourth time; 596 a fifth time; 1388 more than five and less than ten times; 1,405 ten times and less than twenty times; 576 twenty times and less than 40 times, and several others even more frequently, one who died in confinement having been committed 176 times.

The fact that no general persistent effort has been made in any country to provide by law against the continuance of this deplorable state of things proves that so far it has been found difficult if not impossible to deter or reform the drunkard by any legal process. Massachusetts is doing something to test the value of continued reformatory restraint and training. During the year 1889 52 common drunkards and 77 convicted of drunkenness for the second or third time were sent to the Reformatory for men, the whole number sent from 1884-5 inclusive being 354 common drunkards and 654 convicted of drunkenness more than once. To the Reformatory for women 92 were sent for drunkenness, the average length of whose sentences was one year two months and six days. The superintendent of the Reformatory for women says that many of the drunkards entrusted to her care have been thoroughly cured. Her opinion is that it requires fully two years to quench the craving of a confirmed drunkard for alcoholic stimulants, and to build up the moral and physical strength sufficiently to enable her to resist temptation when she returns to the world. During the past nine years 917 women have been committed to this institution on charges of drunkenness.

Compulsory abstinence from the use of alcohol in any form, and a careful strengthening of the moral and physical nature, may be successful in rescuing many of those who have not become mere wrecks mentally and physically and who are not thoroughly depraved. To achieve any marked degree of success in dealing with this monster evil, prevention and earnest rational means of restoring the fallen must be combined.

The evidence given as to the causes of drunkenness, its effects and the best mode of dealing with it, differed very widely. Some witnesses thought drunkenness a disease. Even those who refused, on scientific grounds, so to regard it, thought that the drunkard is in most cases to be pitied rather than condemned. That a love of stimulants and a consequent tendency to become drunkards is hereditary is an opinion which we found to prevail very generally. That some, because of their peculiar nervous organisation, or other constitutional weakness, became victims of this dreadful passion more readily than others, and having fallen, can do less to rid themselves of it, was generally admitted. Few, if any, thought that those whose only offence is drunkenness, should be treated as criminals. Many who frequently drink to excess are amiable, inoffensive and industrious, when sober, good fathers, sons and brothers, and even when drunk are harmless. Many, notwithstanding their occasional outbreaks, do much towards supporting their wives and families. To take them away for six or seven months, even for the purpose of effecting a cure, would be to inflict much suffering on those who depend on them for their daily bread. The brutal ruffian who drinks all the money he can get hold of, including the earnings of his wife and the alms which he forces his children to beg, and who takes a savage pleasure in maltreating those he should cherish and protect; the sot who is never sober and who spends an utterly worthless, and useless existence everyone seemed to agree, should be locked up as long as may be necessary where they could do no harm to themselves or any one else. But these are by no means the only drunkards whose cases require consideration.

It is admitted on all sides that the present mode of dealing with those arrested for drunkenness is not effectual as a means of preventing drunkenness, and that as a means of reclaiming those who have become addicted to the excessive use of strong drink it is an utter failure. The imposition again and again of a paltry fine, with the alternative of a few days' or a few weeks' imprisonment, has no serious effect either reformatory or deterrent, and a cry against the continuance of this absurd system has arisen in every country in which drunkenness is prevalent. The Superintendent of the Boston House of Industry speaks of the system as heedless, and says, 'I would suggest that a law be passed whereby "rounders" or common drunkards be committed to some institution for an indefinite period of time, and their release depend on their reformation.'

OHIO.

The Board of State Charities of Ohio says: 'In our workhouses on the average fully one-half of the prisoners are recidivists, and many of them have been convicted scores of times. This class are largely habitual drunkards who make the workhouse a place of refuge to sober off in and recruit their wasted energies at the expense of the public. When at large they are a terror to their families and a nuisance to the community. To them temporary imprisonments are neither reformatory nor preventive, and the costs of repeated convictions are unnecessary expenses to the Government. . . . To remedy this condition of affairs, workhouse superintendents are substantially unanimous in recommending cumulative sentences, doubling the fine and time at each repetition, and if this should prove insufficient then after the third or fourth offence make the sentence indefinite with a five years limit with power of parole for good conduct at the end of one year. This action would at least protect the public to a large extent from this class of offenders, and would make their labour of sufficient value to pay the expenses of the prison and possibly something for the support of their families.'

MINNESOTA.

'The Secretary of the Board of Charities of the State of Minnesota in his report for 1889 says, The commitment of this class of prisoners to jail for ten days or less is worse than useless. It only cleans them up and whets their appetites for a new debauch.'

The witnesses who appeared before the Prison and Reformatory Commission of Ontario were satisfied that in many cases the reformation of drunkards can be effected if the effort be made in time and proper means be employed, and that much good can be done even in cases in which occasional relapses may occur. They agreed that to effect a cure it is absolutely necessary that the drunkard should be kept under restraint until the craving for strong drink has been subdued, and the physical, mental, and moral nature has been sufficiently strengthened. Three months may be sufficient in some cases to work this great change, six months may be sufficient in others; but in many cases at least a year would be necessary, and in not a few cases even more than a year. It was the general opinion also that it is absolutely necessary that the minds and bodies of those under restraint should be actively employed, that habits of industry should be enforced, and that all wholesome influences, physical, intellectual, moral and religious, should be employed to give the strength needed in what must be a life-long struggle.

SAN FRANCISCO.

INEBRIATE HOME.

The system of treatment pursued is no one, iron-clad, routine 'cure' for every case, but includes all the most efficient methods sanctioned by the researches of scientists and the experience of specialists in this line of professional work. Each patient is studied individually with reference to the original cause of his enthrallment.

its duration and effects on the system, his ability to exercise his will, and his desire to be permanently freed from his slavery; also as to his general condition, physically and mentally; and is placed under a special treatment, in accordance with the particular requirements of his own case, and the length of time at the disposal of the physician in which to accomplish the desired end. The rules and regulations imposed on patients are as liberal as possible, and are necessary for the individual welfare of each and the general comfort of all. The attendants are especially selected for their kindness of disposition, their firmness of character and integrity of conduct. Visitors are admitted to see their relatives on specified days of the week, and in such a manner that other inmates are not exposed to their observation.

Patients are absolutely protected from publicity, and their affairs are guarded in every respect from injury while under the care of this institution. The part of the house devoted to women is entirely isolated from that occupied by men, and is supplied with every convenience necessary to their comfort.

Inebriates of every kind are received, and all are treated, except such as are considered unfit for treatment by reason of special complications. In the former class are comprised not only alcoholic cases of acute and chronic type, but also those afflicted with the morphine, opium, cocaine, chloral and other drug habits, and with nervous diseases resulting directly therefrom. Persons in a dying condition, those requiring surgical treatment or operations, and cases of advanced organic disease due to alcoholism (such as cirrhosis of the liver with dropsy), are not received,—being unsuited to a Reformatory Institution, and more properly subjects for a general hospital having a full staff of physicians, surgeons, specialists and trained nurses.

The observation of persons suspected of insanity has been an important part of the work of this Home. Heretofore all such persons from this city and county were detained in this House until their examination by the Commissioners of Insanity, who remanded many for the observation and report of our resident physician before taking final action on their commitments or discharge. By this system the unfortunate subjects of a charge of insanity were given time for the subsidence of any temporary excitement, recovery from delirium tremens, etc.; were not subjected to association with criminals and the other humiliations of a city prison; received the benefit of the observation of a competent and impartial physician, and were removed from disturbing influences or persons pending the final hearing of their cases by the Court. As a result of this humane method nearly one-half of those suspected of insanity have been discharged, and saved from the cloud which always follows one who has been an inmate of an insane asylum. While the management have discontinued doing this work for the city and county of San Francisco under present financial arrangements, they will continue to extend the benefits of the house, in like manner, to persons suspected of insanity, whose friends desire to give them time and opportunity for recovery before taking legal steps to have them committed to an insane asylum.

The Act of the Legislature of California, approved April 1, 1870, empowers the managers of this Institution to 'receive and detain in said Home, under such restrictions and discipline as they shall deem proper, such persons as may be thereto committed or otherwise placed in said Home.'

This Home is not a commercial establishment. No person or set of persons can derive any pecuniary benefit from their connection with its management, except the regular employees on fixed salaries.

Statistics for 1893.—On January 1, 1893, there were 24 cases in the House, and during the year there were 1026 admitted, making a total of 1050 cases treated, of which 705 were admitted for alcoholism, 328 for insanity (102 of which were alcoholic cases), 13 for morphinism and cocaineism, and 5 for bromism, insomnia, etc. As many of the alcoholic cases were readmissions of the same persons, in some instances several times during the year, the actual number of individuals under this heading was much less, namely, 437. These numbers are exhibited in detail in the following table:—

TABLE of Individual Cases Admitted.

Admitted for	Remarks	Males.	Females.	Total.	Aggregate.
Alcoholism (705 Admissions)	Admitted once only,	156	27	183	437*

	...	4	1	5
Morphinism and Cocaineism, Bromism, Insomnia, &c.,	Totals,	664	119	783	783

* Of these 86 had delirium tremens when admitted.
 Of these 109 had delirium tremens when admitted.

Remarks on the Cases of Alcoholism.—Beside the 437 individual cases of alcoholism, 102, or more than one-half of the cases of insanity discharged by the court, were cases of the same kind, but, who, being in delirium tremens, were supposed to be insane when arrested. These added to the others gives a total of 807 admissions, or 539 individual cases of alcoholism altogether, of which 102 plus 36, or 138 in all, were in delirium tremens when received.

Among these cases it will be observed that 183 plus 102, or 285, were persons who had never been in the House before, and who have not returned thereto since. It may be assumed that very few (or none) would be brought here for a first 'spree'; hence nearly all our cases may be considered as victims of the alcohol habit. Making all due allowance for those who have left the city, and for those who have continued drinking, though not to such an extent as to require to be replaced under treatment here, it may reasonably be assumed that a large proportion of this number (285) have remained free from drink as a result of their treatment and detention in this Institution. It is quite impossible to follow up these people, in so changeable a community as this, to ascertain the results in each case; but a few notable ones, personally known to some of your honourable body, as well as to myself, may be mentioned in detail.

Keeley Graduates.—Among those admitted were forty-six so-called 'graduates' of the Keeley, Milen and similar 'cures,' of which thirty-six had passed through the regular Keeley treatment at the Dwight, Los Gatos, Riverside, and other 'Institutes.' A list of these cases is kept among the records, with full details of each.

QUEENSLAND.

COLONIAL SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
BRISBANE, 24th June 1893.

SIR,—In further reference to the subject of my circular letter of the 2nd instant relative to the scale to which it has been found necessary to restrict the assistance to be given by Police Magistrates to destitute persons, I am now directed by the Colonial Secretary to state that, owing to the increasing number of applications for relief at a time when the finances of the State are least able to meet such demands, it has become imperative to define still more precisely the limits within which the representative officers of the Government may be permitted to incur expenditure in relieving destitution.

I am accordingly to inform you that relief is to be distributed in future on the following scale:—For adults, per week, four pounds meat, four pounds of bread or flour, one pound of sugar and two ounces of tea, and half these quantities in the case of children; but that these rations are to be issued only to married people and their young families. Single men living in towns are to be excluded from such assistance, and it is not considered desirable to encourage this class to remain in stationary dependence upon the Government instead of making effort to obtain work outside their own locality.

With regard, however, to the class of men, married or single, bona fide travelling in search of work, in whose case the assistance given is only casual, and who have not the opportunities of benefiting by the organised or private charities which are open to the poor in towns, and who, moreover, deserve to be encouraged in their search for occupation, it has been decided that sufficient rations be issued to carry them on their way to their place of work or to the next centre of relief distribution, on the following scale:—Per week, seven pounds of meat, seven pounds of bread or flour, two pounds of sugar and four ounces of tea. Railway passes, however, are not to be granted in these cases unless the Police Magistrate is satisfied that there are definite prospects of employment for the applicants at the places for which the passes are issued.

I am to add that at all townships where there are persons holding contracts for Government supplies, the orders for relief are to be upon such Contractors, and are to be paid for at contract prices.

It is considered desirable that the nature of these instructions should be made as publicly known as possible, since there can be no doubt that the prevalent idea that the Government is in duty bound to provide for all the requirements of the unemployed tends greatly to diminish the efforts and contract the sphere of local benevolence.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,
W. E. PARRY OKEDEN,
Under Colonial Secretary.

CHIEF SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
BRISBANE, 27th September 1894.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt from your Excellency of a copy of Lord Ripon's despatch, Queensland, No. 37, of 9th August 1894, enclosing copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, and Beggars in Scotland, asking for certain information in connection with social questions now being inquired into in that country.

I may state, however, that 'Beggars' as a class are hardly known in this country; but, for the assistance of persons and families in destitute circumstances, there are in most of the large towns of the Colony voluntarily constituted Benevolent Societies which receive a subsidy from the Government at the rate of £s for every £1 locally subscribed. The administration of the funds is left entirely in the hands of the members of the Societies, but no collective report of their work has been published. The Government also assist men travelling in search of work, all Police Magistrates being authorised to issue relief in the shape of food on the scale mentioned in a circular dated the 31st of May last, a copy of which is enclosed herewith. I send also a copy of a circular dated 24th June 1893, which more fully illustrates the principle of relief distribution,

I have, &c.,

HUGH M. NELSON.

QUEENSLAND.

EXTRACTS FROM ANNUAL REPORT of the Benevolent Asylum, Dunwich, for the Year 1893.

A considerable number of men, who though advanced in years, but still fit for light employment, are isolated here, where their services are of very little value. From applications made from time to time, and from information obtained from various sources, it is manifest that a want of just such men is felt among many farmers and settlers in the country districts. A man who could chop wood, attend to gates, keep yards clean, or attend to a garden—and there are many such handy men in the Institution—would be most useful about many a homestead.

If such a man were to receive food, lodging, and tobacco, or some small remuneration from the employer, and from the Government clothing and blankets, both according to some scale to be determined, it seems to me that many settlers and others would be ready to take advantage of some such arrangement. The employer would be benefited, and the Colony would be relieved of the expense of housing and maintenance, equal to about two-thirds of the annual cost of an inmate. To the inmate himself the change from a quasi barrack and artificial life to one more natural and humanising could hardly fail to be beneficial.

SALE of Intoxicating Liquors, 1885.

Dealers in liquor are forbidden to supply liquor to a prohibited person, and this shall be published twice in one or more newspapers in the district. Penalty, from £5 up to £20, and making good any damage done by the intoxicated person.

AN ACT to Amend the Criminal Law so far as regards the Punishment of Persons Convicted of First Offences. Assented to 6th October 1886.

1. This Act may be cited as 'The Offenders' Probation Act of 1886.'

'Minor Offence'—Any offence punishable on summary conviction before justices, with or without the consent of the accused person, or any offence, of whatever nature, for which, by law a sentence of penal servitude or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a shorter period than three years may be imposed, and for which a sentence of such duration is, in the opinion of the Court, an adequate punishment.

'Offender'—A person convicted of a minor offence.

3. When a person is convicted of a minor offence, not having been previously convicted in Queensland or elsewhere, of an offence, and sentenced upon such conviction, to penal servitude or imprisonment for a period exceeding three months, the following provisions shall have effect:—

- (1.) The Court shall proceed to pass sentence upon the offender in the usual form.
- (2.) The Court may, if it thinks fit, suspend the execution of the sentence, upon the offender entering into a recognizance in such amount as the Court directs, such recognizance being conditioned that the offender shall be of good behaviour for a period from the date of the sentence equal to the term of the sentence, or if the term of the sentence is less than twelve months, then for the period of twelve months, and shall not during the like period do or omit to do any act whereby the recognizance would become liable to be forfeited under the provisions hereinafter contained.
- (3.) When such recognizance is entered into, the offender shall be discharged from custody, but shall be liable to be committed to prison to perform his sentence if, during the period specified in the recognizance, any of the conditions hereinafter specified happens with respect to him.
- (4.) When an offender is so committed to prison the sentence shall begin to run from the date of such committal, but the term of the sentence shall not extend beyond the period specified in the recognizance, and at the expiration of that period the offender shall be entitled to be discharged.

TASMANIA.

MEMORANDUM submitting information asked for by the Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, and Beggars in Scotland.

The only persons who may properly be classed as habitual offenders are a very limited number of drunkards who are frequently arrested by the police in the streets and charged at the public courts with disturbances of the peace. The records show that the total numbers now in this Colony are 74 males and 71 females.

There is no institution in this Colony of the nature of an Inebriate Retreat or Hospital, although statutory provision has been made for the establishment of such places. The numbers of persons who would avail themselves of such shelter are so small as to render provision for a separate establishment for their accommodation impracticable from a financial point of view. The Act regulating the sale of liquor contains a provision under which an habitual drunkard may be declared a prohibited person, and thereupon any one which supplies him with liquor of any kind, or any one who procures it for him renders himself liable to a penalty of £10, or if a licensed publican £50. This provision has been occasionally put into force with very beneficial results to the persons concerned.

The class called Vagrants and Beggars is practically unknown in this Colony. Such persons would not be allowed to be at large, for the police would immediately arrest any one found begging, and the offender would be liable to six months' imprisonment. When a person reaches the time of life when he is no longer able to earn his living, and is a pauper, the Charitable Institutions, controlled by the Government and maintained by funds provided out of the general revenue, affords him shelter and food, where he is maintained in comparative comfort.

BERNARD SHAW,

Commissioner of Police.

7th November 1894.

Third, or any subsequent conviction for drunkenness within ninety days from the first and thirty days from the last, penalty not exceeding £3, or committal to a House of Correction, with solitary confinement up to a week. Index to be kept of persons convicted of drunkenness.

NEW ZEALAND.

ACT by the General Assembly called the 'Police Offences Act, 1884.'

On a third conviction for drunkenness within six months, money-penalty not exceeding £5, or imprisonment up to fourteen days. On any subsequent conviction within six months shall be deemed an Habitual Drunkard, and imprisoned up to three months. Vagrants, idle, and disorderly persons, sentence up to three months.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Idle and disorderly persons who get up to six months includes (1) those having no visible lawful means of support; (2) every Habitual Drunkard thrice convicted of drunkenness in twelve months; (3) every person behaving riotously or indecently.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

INEBRIATE ACT of 1881 Amending the Acts of 1874 and 1878.

Incorrigible drunkard, any person who has been convicted of drunkenness three times within six months. Governor may license retreat. Managed by eight, elected by the contributors. J.P.'s may visit retreat at any time. The J.P. may order apprehension of Habitual Drunkard on his own application and detention for twelve months. A Judge or two J.P.'s may order Habitual Drunkard to appear on the application of any relation or friend, and may order detention for twelve months. Incorrigible drunkard may be committed for twelve months by two J.P.'s or special magistrate. Committee of Management may, with approval of Medical Officer, discharge before expiry of term. Special magistrate or two J.P.'s may, on application of wife or relative, issue a certificate that he is an Habitual Drunkard, which shall be of force for twelve months. Publican supplying drink to a person intoxicated or to any Habitual Drunkard after being served with copy of certificate shall pay £5 for the first offence, £10 for the second, and for the third offence shall lose his licence and shall be debarred from holding another.

1894	42·935	1420	30·23	33·07

The increase of 51 apprehensions last year can be more than accounted for by the fact that over 120 apprehensions were from a model lodging-house opened in 1893, where over three hundred men are accommodated nightly, most of them navvies employed at the two new Railways at present going on in the Burgh. Several reasons may be given for the variations in the number of apprehensions, such as brisk and dull trade; but having had experience in five different Police Forces during the last 23 years, I must say that the more efficient the management of a Police Force is, and the more the Police keeps in touch with the Public, the apprehensions will be less. In this Burgh the apprehensions for assaults on the Police in 1885 numbered 28; in 1894 the number was only 14.

GREAT SCOTLAND YARD,
S.W., 19th February 1895.

Dear Sir Charles Cameron,—I send you the paper you ask for as to the yearly discharges from Reformatory and Industrial Schools,—the former for each year since 1855, and the latter for each year since 1863—but cannot give the average ages in leaving the schools.

I should say that for Reformatory cases the average age would be 19, and for Industrials 16, as few of the latter are really discharged before that age, except on medical grounds.

But you will understand that this is only an approximate figure as, before the Reformatory Act of 1893 was passed, there was power of detention till 21, which many schools availed themselves of, but I have little doubt that from 18 to 19 is the real age for actual discharge, though many are, of course, let out on licence at an earlier age.—Yours faithfully,

W. COSTEKEE.

Sir Charles Cameron, Bart., M.P.

Note.—Ages on leaving Reformatory and Industrial Schools taken as 18 and 16 respectively, in accordance with Sir Charles Cameron's letter of 20th February 1895.

Notes of Mortality taken as those prevailing in general population—male and female rates being distinguished. (It is probable that the mortality will be higher amongst the class of the community in question than in the general population, and that the number of actual survivors will therefore be less than the above figures indicate.)

APPENDIX LXXVII.

MEMORANDUM by Governor Napier of Greenock Prison.

The only additional information I can give you is that out of about 3000 prisoners received yearly, about half of the males and about three-fourths of the females have been in prison before.

Only one-fifth of the females received during the year 1893 are in for the first time, and one-third of the males are in for the first time.

Of those received last year, 230 females were habitual offenders, and 150 males were the same; and the number received in last year were 1288 males and 823 females.

Male.—Amongst the oldest offenders we have had lately is D. M'C., who has been 96 times in, chiefly for drunkenness; he commenced coming to prison about twenty-one years ago, and was never convicted of theft. He was sent from the Prison to the Asylum some years ago, having gone wrong with religious mania; after getting better he started his old habits, and has been often here (in prison) since.

J. Q. has been 90 times in; he is somewhat like above, but commenced his career thirty-one years ago.

Female.—S. M. has been 240 times in this prison; started her career about forty years ago.

R. A. M. has been 181 times in this prison. She has been two years out of the last five years in this prison, forbye eight months in the Home, and a considerable time in the Poorhouse.

R. A. G. spends three years out of the five years in this prison; commenced her career twenty years ago, and has been 206 times here.

B. G. (a sister of above) has been 209 times, and has also spent three years out of the last five here.

M. A. G. (a sister of above) has been 80 times in here, and spends two years out of every five years in prison.

M. H. has been 128 times in, and has been in the Home, Refuge, and Poorhouse as well.—Yours truly,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.
22nd December 1894.

To Dr Sutherland.

On the day previous to my examination—viz., 20th December 1894, there were in Greenock Prison 39 males and 25 females.

Of males, only 9 were in for the first time, 30 of the 39 were habit and repute offenders, and 23 of the 39 were in above 6 times (see under).

[N.B.—The police and prison registers of other towns furnish pro rata very similar records. Indeed, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee produce men and women with convictions running up to several hundreds during a lifetime. In 1893 there were in Scotch prisons 1265 who had had 20 convictions and upwards, and 279 with 50 and upwards during their lifetime.

APPENDIX LXXVIII.

HOME OFFICE, WHITEHALL, S.W., 2nd March 1895.

DEAR SIR CHARLES CAMERON,—Mr Asquith desires me to explain that the observations (as to the enforcement of the Licensing Laws) to which the extract, enclosed in your letter of the 25th ult. referred, were contained not in a speech but in a letter sent to the Court of Quarter Sessions for Middlesex, of which I enclose a copy.—Yours sincerely,
F. J. DRYHURST.

WHITEHALL, 27th April 1894.

SIR,—I am directed by the Secretary of State to refer to the two resolutions passed by the Court of Quarter Sessions for Middlesex in April 1892 and January 1894, to the effect that the attention of the Commissioner of Police should be called to the great amount of drunkenness in Middlesex, with a view to his considering what steps should be taken by the police to ensure the observance of the licensing laws by publicans, and the conviction of any publican infringing the law; and to acquaint you, for the information of the Court of Quarter Sessions, that these resolutions have been made the subject of careful investigation. In the result, it would appear that during the years 1887 to 1892 there has been an increase of about 19 per cent. in the number of persons proceeded against for drunkenness, but, inasmuch as the increase in population during the same period was about 18 per cent., the increase of cases of drunkenness has been very little more than proportionate to the increase of population.

In regard to the enforcement of the law against publicans, most stringent orders are issued to the police to do all in their power to ensure the observance of the licensing laws by publicans, and the conviction of any publican infringing the law: special exertions in particular have been made by the police, and will continue to be made, to prevent or detect the illegal sale of drink to drunken persons, or the offer of inducements by publicans for the purchase of intoxicants by children; and as cases have not infrequently occurred in which magistrates have felt compelled to dismiss charges against publicans on technical grounds or side issues, while expressing the opinion that the charges were most properly brought, arrangements have been made by which the Commissioner of Police will in future, in any case where he considers it advisable, direct the prosecution of a publican, for permitting drunkenness, to be conducted by the Solicitors of the Police Force.

Certain points, however, have appeared in the course of the investigation in connection with the exercise by the Justices of their own powers, both as a judicial and a licensing authority, which the Secretary of State thinks it right to communicate to the Justices for their consideration.

It appears, for example, that in 7 only of the 43 cases in which convictions were obtained against publicans in Middlesex, during the past three years, were the licences held by the offenders endorsed by the Justices; though many of the fines inflicted, ranging in amount from £5 to £10, indicated that the Justices considered the offences to be of a grave nature. In 16 out of the 43 convictions alluded to, the offence was permitting drunkenness or supplying intoxicants to drunken persons. Moreover, in dealing with cases of drunkenness, the Justices have abstained from using to the full the power possessed by them for the punishment of offenders; about one half, or 50 per cent., of the charges of being drunk or disorderly during the past three years have been met by fines ranging from 1s. to 5s., whereas the maximum penalty is 40s.; and in only 8½ per cent. of the total number of cases resulting in convictions was the punishment of imprisonment inflicted. Similar remarks apply to the abstinence of the Justices from the exercise of the punitive powers possessed by them as the licensing authority. The Secretary of State is informed, however, that though 10 cases in which publicans had been convicted during the years 1892–93, for serious irregularities or breaches of the Licensing Acts, were brought by the police before the Middlesex Licensing Justices, in each case the licence held by the offender was either renewed or transferred.

The Secretary of State feels sure that the Justices will be willing to co-operate with the police to the utmost extent of their powers in the difficult task of enforcing the observance of the law on this subject, and he will be glad if you would take an early opportunity of bringing this letter under their consideration.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

The Chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of Middlesex.

APPENDIX LXXIX.

POPULATION STATISTICS.

In the following letter the Registrar-General explains the principles adopted in drawing up various statistics of population which he kindly furnished for use of the Committee:—

22nd February 1895.

DEAR SIR CHARLES CAMERON,—I received your letter of the 19th instant, and, in reply, beg to transmit estimates, which I have caused to be framed, for the figures to be inserted in the population column of your proposed table.

As you are probably aware, estimates of population used in the official statistics are framed on the supposition that the increase, or decrease, of population between two occasions of taking the census proceeds equably from year to year during the decade, in a uniform geometrical ratio, and that the rate during the current decade will be the same as for the last decade.

This method of framing estimates has, on the whole, given satisfactory results when applied to areas of considerable extent, or to large masses of population; and it has been the practice to apply it, both in Scotland and England, to counties and principal towns, but not to lesser areas.

I have, however, caused estimates to be worked out on the principles indicated above for the places mentioned in your table; and, if round numbers approaching the figures thus obtained are adopted for the table, the result may probably be regarded as a fair approximation.—I remain, yours very faithfully,

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS OF GIPSY CHILDREN.

DEAR SIR CHARLES CAMERON,—In reply to your letter of the 23rd instant respecting the mode of Registration of the Births of children of parents who have been irregularly married, and whose marriages have not been registered, I beg to inform you that no special instructions have been issued on the subject. The matter has always been left to be dealt with by the Registrars under the general provisions of the Registration Act. These require the parties to give information to the Registrar, to the best of their knowledge and belief, of the particulars required to be registered, under penalties for wilfully giving false information; and, accordingly, in the case supposed, if the parties state that they are married, it is the duty of the Registrar to enter the child as legitimate, warning the parties before doing so of the consequences of making any untrue statement.

In dealing with persons of nomadic habits, the local Registrars are often placed under difficulties, as they have generally to dispose of the case on the spot, since, otherwise, the parties might leave the neighbourhood without completing the registration, and such parties sometimes make ambiguous averments,—stating that they are married for the time being, or using other qualifying expressions. Nevertheless, I believe that, for the most part, the entries made by the local Registrars would stand the test of a trial in a Court of Law, or any other investigation.

Errors, of course, may sometimes occur; but the Registration Act provides that any error may be corrected by the Sheriff at the instance of any person who believes he has discovered one. In this way, any person who believes that a child has been erroneously entered as illegitimate could bring the matter to a test.

From an examination which I have caused to be made of the Registers of Births for 1893 of the Parishes and Districts of Perthshire, it appears that the number of births, in that year, in that county in which the parents are entered as travelling tinkers, or tinkers, was eleven, of which six are entered as legitimate, and five as illegitimate. The return is, perhaps, not exhaustive, as the nomadic classes cannot always be identified under the designations which they take; but the figures, so far as they go, indicate how the matter stands with regard to tinkers in Perthshire. . . .—I remain, yours very faithfully,

STAIR AGNEW, R.-G.

APPENDIX LXXX.

MR NAPIER'S PROPOSAL AS TO FINES AND IMPRISONMENT.

H.M. PRISON,
GREENOCK, 8th March 1895.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON, M.P.,

Chairman of Committee on Habitual Offenders.

SIR CHARLES,—In writing some time ago to the Committee on Habitual Offenders, I stated that when a magistrate is giving a sentence of so many days, there should be a uniform charge made per day, as an alternative, according to the number of days stated. Thus, if 20 days is the sentence, 20s. of a fine (or 1s. per day) should be the alternative, or in some cases 2 or 3 shillings per day might be charged. I did not then state my reason for this, but do so now, for your private consideration.

Suppose a man (a foolish tradesman for instance) get a sentence of 20 days, or 20s. fine, and his wife, or other relative, was unable to find the money, perhaps in 10 days thereafter they could pay 10s., or in 15 days 5s.; is it not fair and reasonable that the prisoner should be at once liberated, as the full penalty would in this way be fully paid, partly by time service and partly by money value.

At the present time, even on the nineteenth day, the full sum of 20s. must be forthcoming before the person can be liberated, while I maintain that 19 days' time service and 1s. should satisfy the ends of justice. The benefit of this system would, I believe, cause a marked reduction in the prison population. More money would find its way to the exchequer or hugh funds, greater liberty given to the subject to enable him to return to work or family, and to some extent would earlier relieve the Parochial Authorities from allowances granted to prisoner's dependents.

I have the honour to be

Your obedient servant,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

EXTRACT OF LETTER FROM SIR C. CAMERON TO MR NAPIER.

19th March 1895.

The more I consider the suggestion contained in your letter of the 8th inst. . . . the more it commends itself to me as rational, equitable, and practicable. The only point that remains to be ascertained is how it would work. In order to test this, I enclose cheque for £5, which I should be much obliged if you would apply in paying the part of the fine which under your proposal would be covered by imprisonment in cases where the prisoner can pay the balance. Thus, a prisoner is in for 40s. or 30 days, and his friends can raise £1, and he wants to get out as soon as possible. When he has been in a period of 15 days, he would under your scheme be entitled to liberation on payment of the £1. At present he is entitled to liberation on payment of the 40s. You, or if you prefer it, I through you, make up the extra 20s. out of the money sent, and discharge him. . . . I ask you to undertake the work, because, being the author of the idea, you would naturally give it the fairest play. If you consider that formal permission would be required, I shall be happy to apply for it to the Prison Commissioners. . . .

CHARLES CAMERON.

H.M. PRISON,
GREENOCK, 20th March 1895.

TO SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., London.

DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter and cheque for five pounds, which I will carefully use as directed. I thought I would have been able to have answered your last note ere this, but enquiries I had to make have taken up more time than I anticipated. By the end of next week I think I will be able to satisfy you as to the scheme being a workable one, with many advantages, should it be adopted.

As I have already received instructions to give you, as Chairman of the Habitual Offenders Commission, any information, I don't think it is necessary to ask further permission.—I am, yours respectfully,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

H.M. PRISON,
GREENOCK, 25th March 1895.

TO SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P., London.

DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I presume you are aware that under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, power is given to Magistrates in Clause 6,—

- 1st. To allow time to pay fines.
- 2nd. To allow fines to be paid by instalments.
- 3rd. To have security for the payment.

It may also be within your knowledge that the apparent advantages of this Act are seldom or ever granted by Magistrates. I have been informed by officials concerned that this Act is unworkable without a great deal of trouble, risk and annoyance.

The scheme I have suggested can be worked out with ease, and without the slightest alteration of present court procedure or dislocation whatever of the usual machinery outside of the prison. If there be any trouble, the little extra work will devolve upon the prison officials, probably a few extra entries to be made in books and such like.

The principal burden of finding the money to pay the fine in whole, or part, will entirely rest on the shoulders of the prisoners, and it will depend on their own exertions whether their imprisonment will be long or short.

I can safely say, after a very long connection with police and prisons, that very few persons care to remain one day in prison if by hook or by crook they can get out of it. They dislike the prison discipline, and liberty seems to be a sweet morsel to them.

If prisoners are able to procure the whole of the fine before their removal to prison, so much the better, but if not, immediately after the prison is reached they will be allowed to send a letter, or printed form of request, for the fine, to their friends. Should the fine be paid at the prison before 7 P.M. on the day of incarceration, the prisoner will be liberated immediately thereafter. Should the money not be forthcoming till next day, a day's proportion would be deducted—a prison day is counted by being in confinement one night. The letter would explain to the prisoner's friends that whatever time service the prisoner had put in, the fine would be lessened accordingly, so as to induce them to make every effort to procure a portion of the fine, or pay according to the strength of their purse, and thus shorten the period of their friend's incarceration.

On the receipt at the prison of any part of a fine, the Governor would deduct so much time service equivalent to the amount received, and inform the prisoner what remission had been granted to him. If he failed in his first effort, it should be left to the discretion of the Governor to allow him to make a second appeal to his friends.

As prisons are sometimes far distant from court houses, fines in whole or in part could be sent by P.O. or Postal Order to the Governor of the prison where the prisoner is incarcerated.

Whole fines should, however, be paid to the police or prison officials, but part fines to the Governor of the prison only, to prevent mixing of accounts or making mistakes as to days of remission covered by the part fine.

Should this plan be adopted, there might be some points which would require to be adjusted, such as if a prisoner's time expired on a Sunday, would that day be, or be not, counted in paying a part fine. If he had served his full time he would be entitled to be discharged on the Saturday. I would say, as he has not served his full period, it should be taken into account in dividing the fine. Again, there might arise another question, where, say, a fine of 30s. and 12s. 6d. expenses was given—I would say the expenses should not be reducible; but these are matters of opinion for better judges than I am, and the Prison Commissioners or the Secretary for Scotland would perhaps require to be consulted to some extent on such questions.

In order to prevent persons who have never been in prison before from being sent to a prison, where there is any reasonable expectation of the fine being paid, the person should be detained in the police cells for not over 24 hours after conviction, provided that it can be conveniently done (I should leave this to the discretion of the police), in order to see if the fine be forthcoming. If removed to prison next day, the time would count as if they had been in prison from time of conviction. This is done at present with persons confined in police cells (in my district) at Campbeltown, Inverary, and at Rothesay ordinary cells, when a case is prolonged till after the boats cease running for the day. This might save a respectable person from undue exposure.

I return the schedule sent showing three deserving cases. A portion of the fines I paid with part of the money you sent. These in my view are sufficient to show the practicability of the scheme, and others could be got, but I think it would be throwing away money needlessly to have more. Once the public became aware that a part fine would be accepted, I am confident a very large number of prisoners, probably a half, would take advantage of it.

Should you be satisfied with what I have done, I will return the unexpended money on hearing from you.

I have the honour to be

Your obedient servant,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

TO SIR CHARLES CAMERON, Bart., M.P., London.

DEAR SIR CHARLES,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 25th inst., and in answer to query as to 'The number of prisoners sent in, in default of payment of fine, who were liberated on payment of the whole fine,' I have to inform you that the number from the 6th to the 19th inst. inclusive were eight. Five paid the fine on day of admission, two on the day after, and one on two days after.

As a rule, when three or four days pass without payment, there is very little chance of the fine being paid in full.

Only once has this occurred in this prison during the past twelve months, and that was a case where a woman was fined 40s. or 30 days; her husband died when she was 21 days in custody, but his life being insured, her friends, on the security of the insurance money, paid the full fine to enable her to attend the funeral.

Perhaps you might take into consideration, even where a definite sentence is given (for petty offences only), say, of 14, 15, 20, 21, 30, 40 or 60 days, whether, by petition to the Magistrates who gave the sentence, a person might be released after serving half of his sentence, on the purchase system, that is, if his friends were willing to pay so much per day, on a given scale, for the remainder of the period, provided (1st) that the Governor certified that his conduct had been good in prison, (2nd) that the Magistrate was satisfied that his release would benefit him or his family, and (3rd) that the Prison Commissioners were satisfied that the person who certified that he would be responsible for his conduct till the expiry of the full term of sentence, was a trustworthy and respectable townsman or citizen.

I have the honour, &c.,

WM. NAPIER, Governor.

* Under the Glasgow Police Act of 1862, Section 145, disorderly cases were treated as drunk and 'disorderly,' but, under the 1866 Act, Section 135, the word 'drunk' was deleted, and such cases treated as disorderly only.

Prior to 1873, it was not customary to bring persons found drunk and incapable before the court, but the magistrates then directed that all cases were to be brought before the court, and ever since that has been done.

There was no change in the law, only in the administration. There was no change in the law or administration in 1875. The Act of 1866 is the principal Act in operation.

APPENDIX LXXXII.

MEMORANDUM by Mr. C. S. LOCH, Secretary of Charity Organization Society, London.

I. With regard to the estimated number of vagrants in England and Wales as compared with Scotland, I would, as desired, append a note. The questions and answers to which I refer more particularly are Nos. 14,914 to 14,927, and 14,943 to 14,945.

The Scotch census of vagrants is a census of 'vagrants, 'beggars, migratory poor, &c., on tramp within the county, 'city, and burgh police districts on the nights of the 25th 'June and 24th December.' On these dates in June 1893 and December 1893, the totals were respectively 9,655 and 8,288, giving a mean 8,971.*

The English census of vagrants is a census of vagrants relieved in England and Wales on the 1st July and the 1st of January in each parochial year ended Ladyday. On these dates in 1892-3 the totals were respectively 6,636 and 7,139, giving a mean of 6,888.†

These two census cannot be compared. The Scotch census (1st June '93) includes, for instance, 259 in 'prisons

'and police cells,' 387 in 'houses of refuge, hospitals and 'poorhouses,' 4,786 in 'common lodging and other houses,' and 4,223 in 'public parks, gardens, or streets, outhouses, 'sheds, barns, or about pits, brick and other works.' The two latter classes are much the largest and really important. The two former are by comparison small. The English census is not in the broad sense a census of the 'migratory 'poor,' but only of those who are vagrants and receive poor relief. If, therefore, a comparison is to be made by count or estimate, the 'migratory poor' other than vagrants who receive poor relief must be added to the English figures.

In two counties in England a special census has been made, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire—perhaps also elsewhere. I give the figures for the former. The census in that case is made on the first Tuesday in April, and it includes all those in casual wards and common lodging-houses, distinguishing local residents from 'strangers.'‡ In compiling this table from the returns of the chief constable, I have included all the vagrants in casual wards, not excepting those that are known residents. The number of the latter is very small: for instance in 1893, 2 only.

COUNTY OF GLOUCESTER.

Year. 1st Tuesday in April.	Total Number.	Males.	Females.	Under 16.	16 years and above.	Number of Strangers.	Number of known Residents.	Statements supposed to be true.	Evidently living by tramping.	Remarks.
1878. C.W. C.L.H.	139 598	128 426	11 172	9 76	180 522	C.W., Casual ward. C.L.H., Com- lodging-house.
Total,	737	554	183	85	652
1883. C.W. C.L.H.	83 463	65 332	18 181	9 58	74 410	77 279	6 184	50 348	33 115	After the Act of 1882, when the longer de- tention in the casual wards was in opera- tion.
Total,	546	397	149	62	484	356	190	398	148
1888. C.W. C.L.H.	81 594	67 456	14 188	10 61	71 533	80 467	1 127	37 452	44 142
Total,	675	523	152	71	604	547	128	489	186
1892. C.W. C.L.H.	95 472	79 352	16 120	7 42	88 430	89 263	6 209	54 431	41 41
Total,	567	431	136	49	518	352	215	485	82
1893. C.W. C.L.H.	86 508	80 384	6 124	2 34	84 474	84 382	2 176	53 400	33 108
Total,	594	464	130	36	558	416	178	453	141

These figures, it will be noticed, do not include those who are in prison or police cells, or in houses of refuge, &c., the two smaller classes which are included in the Scotch census. But they include the large class which also appears in the Scotch returns, as in 'common lodging-'houses,' &c., and next, as there are no poor law casual wards in Scotland, we can only set the class that is found on the census day in the English casual wards against the class that in the Scotch census is entered as in 'public 'parks,' &c. There is no English census of persons sleeping out in parks, &c.

Taking as the basis of our estimate the Gloucestershire return we find the results as follows:—

1893: In the casual ward, 86; evidently living by begging, 108; population of Gloucestershire, 548,886; population of England and Wales, 29,002,525; proportion of casual ward inmates and beggars in England and Wales about 10,000.

But if we include vagrants in the casual ward, 86, and all strangers in common lodging houses, 332, the proportional estimate for England and Wales would be about 22,086.

It may, however, be fairer to take for granted that the proportion of strangers in common lodging houses to vagrants in Gloucestershire holds good throughout England and Wales, or in other words that for every 86 vagrants in a casual ward in England and Wales there would be 332 strangers in common lodging houses. On this proportion, if we take the mean vagrants at 6888 in 1893, we have a total of 26,590 migratory poor in common lodging houses; and to this, if we add the number of vagrants, 6888, we have a grand total of migratory poor—strangers in common lodging houses and vagrants in receipt of poor-law relief—numbering 33,478. This gives, on the population of England and Wales, a ratio of 1.15 per thousand. If we compare this with the Scotch return, we find that the total migratory poor (mean number) was in 1893, 8971, which, on a population of 4,035,647, gives a ratio of 2.22 per thousand of the population.

* Thirty-sixth Annual Report of H.M. Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland, 1893-4, p. 37. In answer 14,917 I gave the wrong figure. It should have been 8,000. The Scotch vagrancy census for December 1893 was 8,288.

‡ County of Gloucester: Return of the number of persons who slept in common lodging-houses and casual wards in Gloucestershire on the first Tuesday in April in each year.

No absolute conclusion can be drawn from these figures as to the number of the migratory poor in England and Wales as compared with Scotland. But they may be taken as indicating generally the proportion of the 'migratory poor' to the total population. In the case of the English figures addition should be made (a) for persons sleeping in Common Shelters and Refuges, (b) those in prisons or police cells, and (c) those who in spite of the provision of casual wards may sleep in 'Parks, &c.'

It may be added that if we compare year by year the returns of vagrants in receipt of Poor Law Relief in England and Wales with the Scotch returns of the migratory poor, the numbers increase or decrease together in the two countries. There is the same general agreement in the rise and fall of the numbers of persons charged with begging in the two countries year by year. This suggests that their actual vagrancy must be very similar, and dependent on similar causes.

II. Note in regard to the works at Abbey Mills (Mansion House Relief Fund) 1892-93, 1893-94, I append as desired a note explaining very shortly what I conclude to have been the results, more particularly in the latter year.

The work was road making, and earth work.

In the first year—1892-93—716 men applied. Of these, 351 were refused as not complying with certain reasonable general conditions, such as not being riverside labourers, or not being resident within the area, or for a year resident in London, or physically capable. In 365 cases—the remainder—inquiry was made. The numbers were reduced in consequence to 253. These were employed, 29 were discharged for insubordination or unfitness, and 16 did not come before the Committee. Of the 208 that remained, 132 received only the temporary benefit of the work at Abbey Mills, and 79 were helped in various ways—13 by emigration.

In 1893-94 the same methods were adopted, but with one or two differences in the arrangements. The area from which cases were taken was enlarged to the whole of the Tower Hamlets, and other than waterside labourers were made eligible, excepting those engaged in season trades. None of the 1892-93 cases were entertained, and the age limit was reduced from 65 to 55 years. The figures for 1893-94 may be compared with those for 1892-93—716 men; 208 or 36 per cent. employed, and 79 or 11 per cent. subsequently assisted. 1893-94, 414 men; 140 or 34 per cent. employed, and 49 or 11·8 per cent. subsequently assisted. No inquiry was made in regard to the 1893-94 figures similar to that made in regard to the cases in 1892-93, on behalf of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade.

The emigration cases in 1893-94 were not nearly so satisfactory as in 1892-93—13 out of 22 or 23 proved failures.

The wages were 6d. an hour. It was not measured or piecework, which would have been a much more satisfactory test. I have said in answer to question 15,004, that I thought that in 1893-94 the figures were worse than in 1892-93. The percentage of cases assisted appears to be nearly the same in both years—11 and 11·8 per cent. But these returns must be discounted by the results of the inquiry made on behalf of the Labour Department in the former year, and in the latter by the failure of the emigration cases, the only evidence of after-results that is forthcoming.

The work, in my opinion, might have been equally well undertaken by the Municipality as part of its ordinary duties, if, in the interests of the community, it was desired to undertake the task at all.

C. S. LOCH.

APPENDIX LXXXIII.

GLASGOW UNEMPLOYED RELIEF FUND.

EXTRACT from Report by the Committee appointed in December 1892, by the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow, to deal with the relief of the Unemployed in the City.

The autumn of 1892 found the City of Glasgow, as it found almost every community within the British Isles, in a condition of very considerable commercial depression. . . . On the first day on which the works were opened (Thursday, 8th December), 87 men were engaged, and the numbers gradually increased, reaching their maximum, 870, on Saturday, 17th December.

The Committee arranged to pay the men one shilling per day, and to those who wrought the entire week, or to those who wrought five days in the week, and had leave of absence for the sixth from the foreman, two shillings were paid on Saturday. In addition to this, and in as far as the parks were situated far from the centre of the city, the men were supplied with breakfast of hot tea and bread in the morning before beginning work, and with a dinner of hot soup and bread at mid-day. On New-Year's day the men who had been at work during the preceding week were invited to a dinner in the Albion Hall, at which the Lord Provost presided, and addressed to the men some very wise and kind words.

It became painfully evident, however, that a very large amount of the distress, while it might be real enough, was the result of habits which would produce poverty and suffering in any circumstances; and as the advancing season was making labour more easily obtained in country districts, the Committee, after 10 weeks' operations, intimated that thereafter each man would be paid the net value of his work—say, stone breaking at 2s. per cubic yard, and digger work at 2d. per cubic yard. This had the effect of reducing largely the already diminishing numbers, until it was found advisable to close the works entirely in the opening week of March.*

During the period the works were open, cases of special poverty and distress were dealt with, and sums amounting in all to £22, 11s., besides boots, blankets, and various articles of clothing, were, on the recommendation of the Committee, distributed by the Charity Organisation Society to between 80 and 90 families.

The amount paid in wages up to the time when the men were paid the net value of their work was—

At Ruchill Park,	£1,295 17 11½
At Springburn Park,	819 15 8
The cost of food during the same period was—
At Ruchill Park,	£300 7 0½
At Springburn Park,	197 2 2½
While the miscellaneous and office expenditure, &c., connected with same, as detailed in cash statement, was £490. 3s. 1½d. making the entire cost £3,103. 6s.
The value of the work performed was as under—
At Ruchill Park,	£407 9 4
At Springburn Park,	571 3 10

Together,	£978 13 2
To which add—

It will be noticed that, while the expenditure at Springburn was considerably less than at Ruchill, the value of the work performed was considerably more. At Ruchill the work was almost wholly that of stone-breaking, which is an art requiring the exercise of very considerable skill; whereas at Springburn it consisted exclusively of trenching and digger work, at which, with application, any able-bodied man might easily have been able to earn more than his full wages. Indeed, when they were put, for a short time at the close, on piece work, many of them had earned their full sum in 4 days.

The entire number of men who from first to last applied for work, and had their cases investigated, was 2,801. Of these 1,700 were labourers. Upwards of 500 were men or less closely connected with the iron trade. The remainder were divided amongst a great variety of occupations.

APPENDIX LXXXVIII.

COPY LETTER, Mr W. DUNBAR, Deputy-Procurator-Fiscal, Dundee, to the CROWN AGENT, Edinburgh.

DUNDEE, 23rd November, 1887.

SIR,—A difference of opinion seems to exist in regard to proving convictions in summary cases since the new Act of 1887 came into operation. In the Sheriff Court here the convictions have been admitted without proof in any case. In the Police Court they are proved in the ordinary way.

It seems doubtful whether the Act alters the practice of proving summary convictions, and I therefore beg to ask for the advice of Crown Counsel—Yours respectfully,

CROWN AGENT.

COPY CROWN COUNSEL'S REPLY.

EDINBURGH, 24th November, 1887.

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of yesterday and to say that Crown Counsel think the Criminal Procedure Act does not alter the practice of proving convictions in summary cases.—I am, your obedient servant,

The Procurator-Fiscal, Dundee.

OPINION ON MEMORIAL OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE FOR THE BURGH OF DUNDEE AND THE CLERK AND LEGAL ASSESSOR OF THE SAID COMMISSIONERS AND OF THE POLICE MAGISTRATES OF DUNDEE.

1. I am of opinion that the rules and forms of procedure, provided by the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, must be adopted in the Police Court of Dundee in so far as this is practicable.

(1.) I think it is not practicable to apply the leading provisions of Section 66 of that Act in the Dundee Police Court, and consequently that these provisions need not be applied there. It is assumed as the condition of these provisions that notice shall have been given to the accused person in a list of productions that the conviction is to be used against him, and failing his giving the counter notice to the procurator fiscal of the district, to the court of which he is cited for the 2nd diet, or the crown agent where he is cited to the High Court of Justiciary for the 2nd diet, &c., the extract conviction shall be received in evidence without proof. But, in the procedure of the Dundee Police Court, no list of productions is served on the accused person, nor do the other requisites for the application of the leading provisions of Section 66 exist. It appears to me, however, that the provision at the end of the Section relative to the proof of convictions by prison officials can and therefore ought to be applied in the Dundee Police Court.

(2.) I consider that it is practicable to apply the provisions of Section 67 in the Dundee Police Court, and that consequently they should be applied there. I do not think that the circumstance of previous convictions being libelled in the complaint, and of the complaint being laid before the magistrate creates any real difficulty in applying Section 67. That Section does not provide that the convictions shall not be mentioned in the indictment or complaint, but that they 'shall not be laid before the jury (court) nor shall reference be made thereto in presence of the jury (court) before the verdict is returned.' Both of these conditions, however, may quite well be fulfilled although the convictions are mentioned in the complaint, as the first of them relates merely to the laying of them before the Jury (Court), and the second, as it appears to me, only prohibits reference being made to them, visa voce, before the verdict or finding. Although at present it is required that in the Dundee Police Court the complaint shall be read publicly, Section 74 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1887 provides that all statutes, laws, regulations, and usages inconsistent or at variance with the provisions of that Act shall be, and that the same are thereby repealed. It seems to me quite possible to comply with Section 67 by omitting to read the part of the complaint which alleges the previous convictions, while reading the rest, and after the presiding magistrate has declared that he finds the accused guilty, but before he pronounces sentence the convictions could be laid before him and proved. I further think that the record of the judgment required by Section 411 of the Police Act of 1863 must now, in respect of the provisions of Section 67 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, be amplified by setting out the particulars relative to convictions thereby required. As accused persons in the Police Court of Dundee have no notice of the particulars of the convictions in the form of a list of productions, it will in my judgment, be proper to insert in complaints the date and place of previous convictions, and, in cases of theft, the nature of the dishonest appropriation, as has hitherto been done.

2. I am of opinion that it is still competent to charge as aggravations, previous convictions for crimes not mentioned in Sections 63, 64, and 65, such as breach of the peace, &c., and further that previous convictions may be charged as aggravations of statutory offences. The object of these Sections was not to limit or exhaustively to define, but rather to extend the rules of law applicable to previous convictions.

3. I do not think that a person arrested on a criminal charge, with a view to being brought before the Police Court of Dundee, is entitled to have the intimation provided by Section 17 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, made before he is either tried in that court or remitted to a higher court. That section provides that where any person has been arrested on any criminal charge, such person shall be entitled, immediately upon his arrest, to have intimation sent to any qualified agent that his professional assistance is required by such person, and informing him of the place to which such person is to be taken for examination, and that such law agent shall be entitled to have a private interview with the person accused before he is examined on declaration and to be present at such examination. These provisions seem to me to show that the enactment was intended to apply only to cases where there was to be an examination on declaration, a proceeding which does not take place in the summary cases coming before the Police Court of Dundee. It would, therefore, be impossible to intimate the particulars required by the section. At the same time upon the principle of applying the Act in so far as practicable, I think it would be proper, wherever a person arrested desires it, to give intimation to a law agent that his professional assistance is required by such person.

The opinion of

EDINBURGH,

28th November 1887.

ADDITIONAL OPINION for the Commissioners of Police for the Burgh of Dundee and the Clerk and Legal Assessor of the said Commissioners and of the Police Magistrates of Dundee.

When the accused pleads guilty to the substantive charge, but on the previous conviction libelled being read, denies it, it should, in my judgment, be proved, and when the accused is found guilty on evidence of the substantive charge, but on the previous conviction libelled being read, admits it, his confession should, in my judgment, be accepted, and in each case the record should bear what actually took place as regards the substantive charge and conviction respectively.

This appears to me to be the necessary result of the separation of the aggravating conviction from the substantive charge affected by the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887. I do not see that there would be any harm in adding in the complaint the sentence pronounced on the occasion by the previous conviction libelled, but I do not think that it would be sufficient to enter on the record of the judgment that the accused was found guilty of the substantive crime or offence charged, on evidence adduced, or on his own confession as the case might be, aggravated by previous conviction 'as libelled.' Section 67 of the Act requires that 'the clerk of the court in which sentence is pronounced shall enter in the record of the trial a statement of the contents of any extract conviction that is put in evidence setting forth the date, the place of trial, the court, the nature of the crime, the aggravations accompanying it, if any, and the sentence pronounced.'

The object of this enactment plainly was to secure that the recorded judgment, the extract of which might be used in subsequent cases, should itself contain all the requisite particulars and object would not be obtained by reference to another document in the words 'as libelled.'

The opinion of

EDINBURGH,

30th December, 1887.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 'CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1887.' By D. DEWAR, Chief-Constable and Procurator-Fiscal, Dundee.

Section 71 of the 'Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,' enumerates the sections in the Act which are declared to apply to all summary complaints in inferior courts 'except where there is anything in any section which specially applies to procedure in the High Court of Justiciary and the Sheriff Court when the Sheriff is sitting with a jury,' and it provides for the word 'court' being substituted for the word 'jury.' It also provides 'that the mode of setting forth the charge given in Schedule A may be followed in such summary complaints, the third person being substituted for the second.'

Doubts have arisen as to whether Sections 66 and, 67 although among the sections enumerated in Section 71 as applicable to summary complaints, do really apply to such complaints.

It appears that the leading provisions of Section 66 cannot by any possibility be made to apply to summary prosecutions, because (1st), there is no list of productions appended to summary complaints; (2nd), there is no second diet, second diets being only applicable to High Court and Sheriff and Jury cases; and (3rd), there is no list of witnesses served on an accused person in summary complaints.

It is submitted that the only part of Section 66 which can by any possibility apply to summary complaints is that contained in the last five lines of the section, which provides for prison officials being competent witnesses to prove previous convictions, although not present at the trials when convictions obtained.

Section 67 appears also to apply exclusively to High Court and Sheriff and Jury cases, although the word 'jury' in that section is read 'court.'

In the first example of indictments, or summary complaints given in Schedule A of the Act, the form in a case of theft ends with the following words:—'And you have been previously convicted of dishonest appropriation of property.'

At the beginning of Section 67 it is provided that 'Previous convictions against a person accused shall not be laid before the jury (or court), nor shall reference be made thereto in presence of the jury (or court) before the verdict is returned.'

In every case the complaint in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction is laid before the magistrate in order to obtain the warrant to apprehend or cite the offender, and if the accused has been previously convicted, the magistrate must necessarily know that fact from having the complaint submitted to him prior to his granting the warrant, so that it is impossible to prevent reference being made to a previous conviction, when the same is libelled in a summary complaint. In addition to this the Rules applicable to the Police Court of Dundee provide for the complaint being read publicly in court, and where a previous conviction is libelled upon, it must necessarily be referred to before the magistrate presiding in the court, before the accused is asked to plead to the charge against him, although in High Court and Sheriff and Jury cases the indictments close with a reference to the fact of the accuseds having been previously convicted, when such is the case this is not brought under the notice of the jury, as Section 54 of the Act provides 'that it shall not be necessary to lay before the jury copies of the indictment.'

In Scotch Criminal Jurisprudence a verdict is returned only by a jury, and the term 'verdict' is not applicable to 'court.' For dissertations on 'verdict' see Hume, Alison, and Macdonald's Criminal Law, as also Bell's Law Dictionary.

Section 67 also provides as follows:—'The clerk of the 'court in which the sentence is pronounced shall enter in the record of the trial a statement of the contents of any extract conviction that is put in evidence, setting forth the date, the place of trial, the court, the nature of the crime, the aggravations accompanying it, if any, and the sentence pronounced; and when such person is again accused of any offence, in regard to which such conviction may be competently used as an aggravation, a duly certified extract of the conviction setting forth the particulars of previous convictions as above, shall be admissible and sufficient as evidence to prove against him all the previous convictions and aggravations therein set forth.'

A police court is not a court of record, only the complaint, with the finding of the magistrate and the sentence thereon, is preserved, see Clause 411 of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' whereas in High Court and Sheriff and Jury Courts, an elaborate record is kept, and will continue to be kept in accordance with forms prescribed by an act of adjournal which has been framed by virtue of the powers conferred by this Act, a copy of which is sent herewith.

The utility, so far as police courts are concerned, of including in the finding and sentence by a magistrate the aggravation of any previous conviction is in a great measure lost, as by Clause 413 of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' persons accused of the crimes therein enumerated, and of certain crimes aggravated by two previous convictions, cannot be tried in the police court, but must be remitted to a higher court,—only one previous conviction for such crimes as assault, theft, fraud, embezzlement, &c. can be proved in the police court.

The ground for maintaining that Sections 66 and 67 must in whole or part apply to summary prosecutions is that these sections are enumerated in Section 71, and that the word 'jury' does not occur in any of the sections therein enumerated, except in Section 67.

A form of complaint in a case of theft, aggravated by a previous conviction as now in use in police court prosecutions at Dundee, is sent herewith, and it would be desirable to know whether it is proper to insert in the complaint the date and place of previous conviction, and the nature of the dishonest appropriation as is done in the copy sent. To omit to do this in summary cases would be very unfair to the accused, because it is the only notification given him as to the previous conviction to be proven against him. In High Court and Sheriff and Jury cases similar particulars of previous convictions are given in the list of productions to be produced at the trial, and these are accessible to the prisoner and his counsel or agent previous to the trial.

Sections 63, 64, and 65 of the Act provides for previous convictions being charged as an aggravation in certain crimes. Is it still competent to charge as aggravation previous convictions for crimes not mentioned in these sections, such as breach of the peace, &c.? And can previous convictions be charged as aggravations for statutory offences?

Section 71 provides that sections therein enumerated and relative schedules shall apply to summary complaints. Schedule A is the only schedule referred to in the enumerated sections.

Does Section 17 of the Act apply to persons in the custody of the burgh police for crimes or offences to be tried under the Police Act; or to persons apprehended by them for crimes or offences, which, on account of aggravations such as those enumerated in Section 413 of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' require to be remitted to the Sheriff, and if so, to what extent?

APPENDIX XCIIA.

20th April 1895.

DEAR DR SUTHERLAND,—

I estimate that the probable saving on the Prisons ~~note~~ by the withdrawal of a daily average number of 560 prisoners will be seven thousand eight hundred and forty pounds (£7840).

Yours truly,

WM. DONALDSON.

J. F. Sutherland Esq., M.D.

APPENDIX XCIIb.

MASSACHUSETTS.

An Act to extend the scope and ~~secure~~ the better administration of the probation system; and an Act to provide more effectually for the prevention of drunkenness and for the reformation of drunkards.

The Act relating to probation officers provides that:—

SECTION 1. The justice of each municipal, police, or district court shall appoint one person to perform the duties of probation officer, as hereinafter named, under the jurisdiction of said court. Each probation officer appointed as herein provided shall hold his office during the pleasure of the court making the appointment.

SECTION 2. Said probation officers shall not be active members of the regular police force, but shall in the execution of their official duties have all the powers of police officers. The records of any of said probation officers may at all times be inspected by the chief of police or city marshal of any city or town, or by the board of police of the city of Boston.

SECTION 3. Each probation officer shall inquire into the nature of every criminal case brought before the court under whose jurisdiction he acts, and may recommend that any person convicted by said court be placed upon probation; the court may place the person so convicted in the care of said probation officer for such time and upon such conditions as may seem proper.

SECTION 4. Each person released upon probation as aforesaid shall be furnished by the probation officer with a written statement of the terms and conditions of his release; each probation officer shall keep full records of all cases investigated by him, of all cases placed in his care by the court, and of any other duties performed by him under this Act."

This Act was approved May 28th, 1891, and "took effect" on 1st of July following.

"An Act relating to the punishment of Drunkenness," passed at the same time as the above, took effect on July 1st, 1891.

It places the person addicted to the excessive use of strong drink largely under the surveillance of the probation officers appointed under the Act previously quoted, and makes the conviction of habitual drunkards more easy and certain. Practically it provides that every person arrested for drunkenness may be treated as a habitual drunkard and sent to the reformatory for the full term, unless it be satisfactorily shown that "he has not been arrested for drunkenness twice before within the twelve months next preceding, or that having been so arrested he has been tried and acquitted in one of the cases." The first section authorises the arrest without warrant of any person "found in a state of intoxication in a public place, or found in any place in a state of intoxication committing a breach of the peace or disturbing others by noise." The other sections provide as follows:—

SECTION 2. Any person arrested for drunkenness may make to the officer in charge of the place of custody in which he is confined, a written statement, giving his name and address, and declaring that he has not been arrested for drunkenness twice before within the twelve months next preceding, or that having been so arrested he has been tried and acquitted in one of the cases, together with a request to be released from custody. If the officer who receives said statement shall be satisfied that it is probably true, and shall so endorse thereon, he may release from custody the person making the same, pending investigation, if he is within the jurisdiction of a court having a probation officer. Each statement made as aforesaid shall be referred by the officer receiving the same to a probation officer, who shall at once inquire into the truth or falsity thereof, and shall endorse thereon, over his own signature, for the use of the court having jurisdiction of the case, the result of the investigation. If said investigation sustains the truth of said statement, the court may thereupon direct that such person be released from custody without bringing him into court, if he has not been released. If the investigation shows that the statement made by a person who has been released from custody, as aforesaid, was true, no further action shall be taken in his case. If it shall appear to the probation officer to be untrue, he shall so notify the officer who made the arrest, and he shall make a complaint against said person for drunkenness. If said case is within the jurisdiction of a trial justice, he shall make such inquiries as he shall think necessary, relative to the truth or falsity of said statement, and may direct that the person making the same be released from custody without bringing him into court, unless he is satisfied that said statement is false.

SECTION 3. Every person arrested for drunkenness, when he has recovered from his intoxication, shall be informed by the officer in charge of the place in which he is kept in custody of his right to request to be released as hereinbefore provided. If he shall not make such request, or if he shall not be released, as hereinbefore provided, the officer making the arrest shall make a complaint against him for drunkenness.

SECTION 5. If a male person is convicted of drunkenness by the voluntary use of intoxicating liquor, he may be punished by imprisonment in the gaol, or in any place provided by law for common drunkards, for not more than one year, or in the Massachusetts Reformatory, as provided by chapter three hundred and twenty-three of the Acts of the year eighteen hundred and eighty-six. If a female person is so convicted she may be punished by imprisonment in the gaol, or in any place provided by law for common drunkards, for not more than one year, or in the reformatory prison for women for not more than two years: provided, however, that if the person so convicted shall satisfy the court or trial justice, by his own statement or otherwise, that he has not been arrested twice before within the twelve months next preceding, or that having been so arrested he has been tried and acquitted in one of the cases, his case may be placed on file.

SECTION 6. It shall be the duty of probation officers to assist the courts by which they are severally appointed, by obtaining and furnishing information in regard to previous arrests, convictions and imprisonments for drunkenness, and such other facts as the courts shall direct, concerning persons accused of drunkenness.

SECTION 7. Each of the said officers shall keep a full record, well indexed, of each such case investigated, in such form as the court shall direct. The board of police of Boston, the city marshals and chiefs of police of the other cities and towns, the keepers of gaols and masters of houses of correction, and the superintendent of the Boston House of Industry shall furnish to each other and to said probation officers, and said probation officers shall furnish to each other, on application, all information in their possession relative to persons whose cases shall be under investigation, as hereinbefore provided.

APPENDIX XCIII.

20th April 1895.

DEAR DR SUTHERLAND,—

I send you in the three Tables enclosed the result of my enquiries as to the Police Burghs in Scotland.

You will see that I have split up the Burghs into three classes:—

- 1st. Those who return separate statistics.
- 2nd. Those having Police Courts the statistics of which are given by the Chief Constables of the Counties in which they are situated; and
- 3rd. A large number of Burghs who have adopted one or other of the Police Acts, but have not availed themselves of the powers to establish local Police Courts. Some of these may do so soon.

In Table II., Burghs with Police Courts the statistics of which are in the County Returns, you will notice that the arrangement given is according to the years when the Police Courts were first held, which I take to be the information most desired by your Committee.

The populations when the Acts were adopted, were got from the Town Clerks; and when they could not give the information, then from the Sheriff-Clerks.

I thought it best to give the population in 1891 from the Census Report than to estimate for 1894.

Yours faithfully,

WM. DONALDSON.

ALCOHOLIC INSANITY.

Forms of insanity given by Sir Arthur Mitchell in his Articles, pp. 525-528, are (a) intoxication, (b) delirium tremens, (c) mania à potu, (d) dipsomania ; victims of the latter not suitable cases for ordinary asylums.

ALEXANDER, M.A., Rev. JOHN.

Chaplain, Glasgow Prison, 10,071 ; thinks existing homes and shelters do good work, 10,073 ; especially where period of detention exceeds six months, 10,078 ; suggests that sentences for petty offenders be increased in geometrical progression, 10,083 ; thinks present sentences on habitual offenders have no deterrent effect, 10,088, 10,111-10,113 ; even long sentences not always deterrent, 10,128, 10,129 ; definition of habitual drunkard, 10,098, 10,137-10,139 ; suggests young girls after being warned on first offence should be sent to reformatory school for one year, and if again convicted for three years, after which, if not effective, to be imprisoned, and sentences increased in geometrical progression, 10,093-10,097 ; thinks unmarried young women offenders should be detained for life, 10,097-10,099, 10,140-10,143 ; considers stipendiaries preferable to magistrates for dealing with habituels, 10,100-10,106 ; difficulty in securing work for discharged female prisoners, 10,107, 10,108 ; personal efforts, 10,109, 10,120-10,126 ; complaints by prostitutes in prison as to unjust arrest, 10,114-10,119 ; serious offenders rarely habitual drunkards, 10,130-10,134.

ANGUS, Mr JOHN WYNESS.

Chief Constable, Greenock, 8908 ; which has special Police Act, 8911 ; intended to meet offence of drunkenness, 9062-9072 ; thinks the steady decrease since 1891 of arrests for petty offences attributable to bad trade and special attention paid to large number of shebeens, 8913-8915, 8932-8949 ; special instructions given to police as to persons found drunk in view of frequent cases of drowning, 8921, 8922 ; tendency of night police to overlook cases from personal considerations, 8922-8927 ; comparison of Greenock and Edinburgh, 8927-8931 ; maximum penalty for drunkenness rarely inflicted, 8977-8986, 9113-9116 ; number of habitual offenders in Greenock, 8950-8961 ; large proportion of prostitutes apprehended for other petty offences, 8962-8963 ; method of dealing with prostitutes for importuning, 8964-8975 ; application of previous convictions, 8987-8995 ; considers treatment of drunks in burghs more effective than lenient county treatment, 8996-9001 ; system of liberation on pledge, minimum in cases of drunkenness fixed at 10s., 9002, 9009-9015, 9081 ; result being few forfeitures, 9002-9008 ; very little vagrancy, 9017 ; bond fide workmen on tramp are helped by police, 9028-9035 ; professionals directed to night asylum, 9022, 9030, 9036-9041 ; special powers for vagrancy in Renfrewshire, 9052-9261 ; difficulty of getting prostitutes to go to Homes, 9073-9076 ; definition of habitual offender, 9084, 9108-9112 ; would deter persons from becoming habituels by fixing sentence to be imposed after third conviction, 9082-9090, 9116-9118 ; juveniles sent to training ships and reformatory or industrial schools generally turn out well, 9094-9099 ; exception in case of Dalbeth R.C. School, 9099 ; approves of whipping boys under 14 years of age, 9100-9106 ; thinks the quality of the liquor has much to do with drunkenness and offences involving violence, 9127-9134.

BARKER, Colonel.

Salvation Army Officer, inaugurated work on Australian Continent, 14,584; quotes Australian 'Juvenile Offender' and 'Neglected Children' Acts, under which rescue work of Salvation Army is recognised by Government, and gives details of their working, 14,587-14,607; State subsidies toward work, 14,609-14,610; work amongst prostitutes, 14,611-14,617; and sundowners, 14,618-14,622; suggests special institutions for inebriates, with detention for 12 months or longer if necessary, 14,624.

BEGGARS.

Should be dealt with by Parochial Authorities, 1949.

Old and Infirm should be sent to Poorhouse and not Prison, 858, 12,590.

Several powers of dealing with them should be strengthened, 2530.

Laws as to begging to be strictly enforced in Counties, 3755, 3935.

Laws should be same in Burghs and Counties, 4416.

Perthshire County Bye-laws effective, 6710.

BIRNIE, Mr JOHN BLACK.

Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire, 9265; quotes 14th and 16th sections of Industrial Schools Act, 1866; under which children found begging, &c., or refractory children under 14 years in charge of parents, may be sent to industrial schools, and states reasons why almost all are sent under 14th section, 9266-9273; also quotes the sections of Reformatory Schools Acts, 1866 and 1893, regulating ages of children sent to or kept in reformatory schools, 9274-9278; children usually sent to Shelter of Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children pending removal to reformatory or industrial school instead of to prison, 9279-9281; provisions for maintenance of schools, 9292-9311; never heard of a case of drunkenness in county portion of Lanarkshire being brought before court, 9315-9324; considers present powers of dealing with petty offences in their earlier stages sufficient, but after second conviction would order prisoner to find security for say £10 not to offend for six months, or in default to suffer one month's imprisonment, and on breach of security to six months' imprisonment, 9325-9335; would make it punishable for a police officer to inform an employer that an employé was a discharged prisoner, 9338-9340; favours adult reformatories, 9341; and the codification of sentences with minimum and maximum, the minimum not to be fixed, but magistrates who decrease minimum to state reasons, 9343, 9344; thinks that before habituals are sent to retreats evidence should be led before Sheriff, in public if desired, 9349-9361; accused to have right of appeal to Sheriff Principal, 9362; in private cases relatives to have power of prosecuting, 9370; Quebec definition of habitual drunkard, 9373, 9374.

BLAIKIE, D.D., Rev. Prof. W. G.

Representative of Edinburgh Free Church Presbytery, 5642; considers drunkenness prevalent amongst both upper and lower classes, that present means of dealing with it are utterly inadequate, and that powers of compulsory detention of Habitual Drunkards necessary, 5654; period of detention to be regulated by medical authority, 5655; approves generally of late Mr Chas. Morton's scheme, but thinks only flagrant cases should presently be dealt with, 5685; churches would gladly co-operate in and help any such movement.

BLAIR, Mr ALEX.

Sheriff of Lothians and Peebles, 4321, 4322; considers present treatment of habitual offenders ineffective, 4418; longer confinement needed, 4419-4422; and suggests that for petty offences after third conviction imprisonment up to 4 months be awarded, after fifth conviction police supervision up to 2 years in addition to imprisonment, and that if convicted while under police supervision imprisonment up to 6 months be inflicted, while if well-behaved during period of supervision, all previous convictions should lapse, 4334-4340, 4406-4408, 4423-4425; regulation of police supervision, 4349-4352; powers to be vested in Sheriff, 4341-4342; infirm habituals having no visible means of subsistence should be boarded out or put under custody of parochial authorities with powers of compulsory detention, 4343-4348, 4426; persons sentenced to imprisonment, but certified unfit for prison discipline, should be sent to poorhouse, 4354-4358, 4403; institutions or persons receiving inebriates, with powers of compulsory detention, to be inspected by Government officials, 4367-4370, 4389-4391, 4396, 4397, 4401, 4402; but administered locally, 4409; proposed procedure for committal of habitual drunkards, 4370-4380, 4451-4459; expense of maintenance to be met by relatives if able, or by Government grant or local rates—if by relatives, they to have choice of retreat, 4381, 4382, 4393-4395; Sheriff to have power to inspect, 4383; penalties for absconding or aiding insane, 4383, 4384; prostitution not obtrusive in Edinburgh, 4463-4468; thinks law as to begging should be same in burghs and counties, 4416, 4417.

BORTHWICK, Lieut.-Col. A.

Chief-Constable of Lothians and Peeblesshire, 3945-3947; thinks provisions of Burgh Police Act as to vagrants and Habitual Drunkards should be extended to counties, 3950, 3961, 4000; number of tramps stationary, 3963-3964; vagrant children wholly illiterate, 3967-3968, 4206; results of late special census of vagrants, &c., 3969-3998; analysis of same, 4003-4021; houses of shelter for tramps, 4022-4024, 4068, 4071, 4076, 4087-4094; strongly disapproves of these, 4067-4068, 4163-4164, 4190-4194, 4214; their effect on vagrancy and crime, 4068, 4073, 4075-4082, 4190, 4202; children found sleeping out sent to parochial authorities, or parents dealt with for cruelty, 4028-4032; would recommend state-endowed school for vagrant children, 4060, 4100-4105, 4116, 4207; difficulty of dealing with them under Industrial Schools Act, 4213; no power in counties to stop begging, 4032; sleeping out dealt with under Trespass Act, 4033-4035, 4211-4212, 4222; bye-laws made under Local Government Act, 1889, set aside by High Court, 4036-4059, 4223; thinks Habitual Drunkards should be confined in institutions for lengthened period and put to work, 4095, 4115, 4176; present treatment not deterrent, 4106; want of means of dealing with cases of deserving tramps, 4158-4165, 4215-4216; considers maximum penalties for drunkenness, vagrancy, and begging severe, 4176, 4180, 4186-4187.

BOYD, Mr JOHN.

Chief Constable of Glasgow, 398; explains system of liberation of drunks, &c., on pledge before trial, 397-404; prior to 1878 was not customary to bring drunk and incapables before Court—liberated by Lieutenant on duty—on pledge, if they had any, 406; particulars kept of all apprehensions, 408; maximum penalties for drunkenness, 411; never known power to enforce sureties exercised, 411; drunkenness and other petty offences decreasing in Glasgow, 426; gives statistics, 429-432; accounts for difference in appre-

hansions for such offences in Glasgow and other towns, 433, 458-465, 515-517; great diversity in practice of Magistrates in dealing with drunkards, and is much the same over Scotland, 394, 405, 507; present methods have no deterrent effect on drunkards, 453, 470-471, 495-497; recommends longer confinement and special treatment, 435, 453-455, 472-475, 504-509, 526; and thinks twelve months should be the minimum, 457; was not aware of attempt to fix full term for drunkenness at sixty or thirty days under Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, 510; thinks it dangerous to fix any number of convictions as constituting a habitual drunkard, 412; which might include working-men who, after pay-days, are convicted for drunkenness, who yet support their families and discharge their other duties, 413, 450-452, 476; while person charged with wife assault and found to be hardly ever sober and no support to family, might escape, 436, 437; persons regarded as habitual drunkards should be dealt with by Sheriff in preference to Magistrates or Justices of Peace, and served with libel as in ordinary criminal cases, 414, 446, 478, 511-513, 528; difficulty of getting relatives to give evidence against habitual, 527-528; number of habituels in Glasgow chiefly females, 415; smallness of numbers accounted for by want of common register of such offences, 416, 498; no means of distinguishing between a habitual drunkard and first offender unless on police testimony, 441, 444, 499-501; very desirable that previous convictions for drunkenness and other contraventions should be libelled—powers for this are being asked, 442; does not think notification of habituels to publicans would do much good, 520-524; difficult to convict publicans for supplying intoxicated persons, 520, 523-524; admits growing tendency to pass longer sentences on 'drunks,' &c., 502-503, 525; begging and vagrancy not prevalent in Glasgow, 427-428, 438, 467; sheltering of destitute tramps in police offices not encouraged, 418-423; applicants directed to Night Asylum or Charity Organization Society, 432-423; bad characters refused, 424; and vagrants found sleeping out at large prosecuted, 425-426; very few juveniles sent to prison, 448-449, 479-480; earliest age at which children may be sent to prison, 479; does not approve of sending children to prison, 480-482; prefers to deal with the parents where possible, or send children to Reformatory or Industrial School, 483-487; and would only send them to prison for day or so, pending arrangements being made for admission to school, unless they could be sent to a children's refuge, which would be preferable, 490-493.

BREMNER, Mr JAMES F.

Chief Constable of Fife and Kinross; no Bye-laws framed by County Council anent vagrancy or drunkenness, 8610-8612; the latter dealt with under Public Houses Amendment Act in county, 8593; considers the additional powers of Burgh Police Act valuable, 8595; but if strictly carried out against beggars, prisons would be filled, 8613, 8614; explains system of pledges, 8597-8601, 8699-8704; no prisoner liberated unless on bail fixed by a Magistrate, 8601-8609; a large number of vagrants in county, 8615-8616, 13,744-13,757; proportion of professional tramps and those seeking employment, 8617-8621, 13,744; many refuse work when offered, 8622; find shelter in common lodging-houses, 8623-8631, 13,758; operation of Trespass Act, 8638-8646; desires powers of Burgh Police Act as to vagrancy extended to counties, 8647; to be exercised with discretion in interest of bona fide cases of persons seeking work, for whom shelters might be erected here and there, 8447, 13,784, 13,788; census of tramps, 8655-8665; would not recommend shelters for these, 8666-8681, 8686-8691; thinks vagrant children should be removed from their evil environment and put to school for lengthened period, 8682-8685, 8690, 8691, 13,826-13,830; petty offences more common among vagrant classes, 8693; previous convictions for statutory offences usually libelled, 8705-8711; thinks it desirable to secure greater uniformity of dealing with petty offences throughout Scotland, 13,798-13,825.

BROWN, Rev. ALEXR., Pollokshields U.P. Church.

Evidence included under that of Rev. A. R. MacEwen.

BRYSON, Miss AGNES ANN.

For 20 years lady visitor at Glasgow prison, 11,931; thinks system of short sentences utterly useless for habitual offenders, 11,932, 11,936; and considers the gratuities given to prisoners a hindrance to their welfare, 11,933-11,935; thinks that intemperance usually precedes prostitution, 11,937-11,942; working of Whitevale Mission Shelter, 11,943-11,945; wages given in return for work, 11,945, 11,954; number of discharged female prisoners who get free breakfast, 11,959-11,965; proportion who are habitual drunkards, 11,965-11,966; number sent to homes, 11,968-11,981; number of juvenile offenders dealt with, 11,982-11,993; facilities for visitation of prisoners in prison, 11,994, 12,004.

Mr Badenoch Nicolson, 13,334.

BURTON, Miss.

Member of Edinburgh School Board, 4945-4948; purchased slum property, and manages same personally, 4949; finds it remunerative, 4952-4953; considers drink the cause of present condition of most slum dwellers, 4950; methods of dealing with tenants, 4955-4961; considers short sentences for drunkenness do no good, 4957; and that inebriates should be confined for lengthened period and kept at work, 4968.

CAMPBELL, Lieut.-Col. John.

Governor Perth Prison, 6782; gives instances of repeated sentences of penal servitude, 6793-6797; such sentences not deterrent mainly on account of association, 6798-6800, 6815; strongly opposed to association of prisoners, 6869-6873, 6895, 6905-6907; does not believe statements as to disastrous results of prolonged separate confinement, 6896-6899, 6904; short sentences for petty offences useless, 6814, 6910, 6918; longer ones more hopeful, 6816; vacant accommodation in Perth prison could be utilised for treatment of habituels, 6811-6813; recommends Swiss system of detention for considerable periods with gradual restoration of liberty, 6817, 6826-6832; number of prisoners who also frequent poorhouse, 6819-6823; employment of prisoners here and on Continent, 6848-6855, 6874-6887; licence of convicts frequently recalled, 6868, 6919-6922.

CAMPBELL, Rev. H. MACKENZIE.

Chaplain of Edinburgh Prison, 3283; a large proportion of prisoners are habitual offenders, 3288-3294; divides them into two classes—habituals of habitude and neurotic habituels, 3295-3300, 3434-3441, 3464-3474; for whom distinct methods of treatment desirable, 3298-3307; illustrative examples, 3308-3350; definition of habitual offender, 3393-3394, 3475-3479; considers they should be detained in prison under classification for a few years, earlier liberation being conditional on good behaviour, 3298-3299A, 3484-3494; habitual vagrants and beggars might be confined in poorhouses, 3354-3361; discrimination in nature of employment desirable, 3428-3429; methods adopted in Canton Neuchatel, Switzerland, 3351-3353; prostitutes sent to prison usually of poorest class, 3362-3363, 3423, 3461-3463; results of reformatory institutions for such not encouraging, 3376-3397, 3442-3444; compulsory detention and suitable employment might give better results, 3418; personal efforts for reclamation of prisoners, 3451A-3459; sending of juveniles to prison prior to committal to Reformatory School hurtful, 3405, 3427; education of juveniles so imprisoned, 3430-3432; effects of First Offenders Act, 3408.

CAMPBELL, Rev. ROBT., Calton U.P. Church, Glasgow.

Evidence included under that of Rev. A. R. MacEwen.

CAMPBELL-IRONS, S.S.C., Mr J.

Has made special study and written treatises on municipal and police law, &c., 5883A-5886; and in last work on police law drew special attention to increasing class of those who alternate between prison and poorhouse, 5887; considers short sentences on habitual offenders useless, 5889, 5897, 5898; would detain certain habituals for two years in homes where work would be compulsory, 5899; vacant poorhouse accommodation being utilised meantime, 5899; homes to be provided by local authorities, 5901-5903, 5913-5919; relatives of inmates to be held liable for their maintenance if able, 5907; and curators to be appointed on estates where necessary, 5908.

CHANCERY LUNATICS.

Such lunatics are served with a petition, 14 days being given to decide whether or not to demand a jury; and if they do, the Lords Justices appoint a visitor to decide whether it should be granted.
Would give inebriates the right of appeal.
Sir James Crichton-Browne, 15,149.

CHISHOLM, Bailie S.

Bailie of Glasgow for three years, and Convener of local Committee on Habitual Offenders, 1-3; accounts for difference in proportion to population of arrests for drunkenness, disorderly conduct, &c., in Scotland and England, 5, 94; and for differences between arrests in Glasgow and neighbouring towns, 94, 96-98; but considers that, with increase of population, Glasgow has not been getting worse since 1875, prior to which statistics cannot fairly be compared with those of to-day, 100-103; explains practice in Glasgow of releasing on pledge, at discretion of Lieutenant of Police, persons apprehended for drunkenness, &c., when they become sober, 7-23, 68, 69, 104-106; no pledges taken from prostitutes, though no special instruction in regard to them, 24-26; arrests of prostitutes very largely connected with drunkenness, 27; and increase in number of such largely accounted for by the employment of policemen in plain clothes, 83; no settled agreement among Glasgow Magistrates as to punishment for drunkenness or as to increase of punishment towards frequent offenders, 28-32; no legal definition of Habitual Drunkard in any Glasgow Act, 123, 127; and as previous convictions are not noted on charge sheet, 126, the only means a Magistrate has of knowing whether a prisoner is a first offender or a habitual drunkard are prisoner's own statement and the evidence of police, 125; considers it inadvisable that previous convictions should be brought to notice of Magistrate before prisoner is found guilty, 143-144; thinks six convictions should constitute an habitual, 133; favours a register being kept of all apprehensions for drunkenness, &c., in Glasgow, 70-74; thinks it useless to seek caution or sureties from habitual drunkards, 75-77; though personally favourable to the sentencing of such to the longer period of imprisonment allowed where caution or sureties are enforced, 78, 89-90; would discriminate between the occasional drunkenness of working men and that of the idle and dissolute loafers who constitute the bulk of Police Court offenders, 145-146; considers present methods of punishment do harm, being simply punitive instead of remedial and reformatory in their character, 79, 90; difficulties in securing satisfactory evidence against publicans supplying liquor to persons already under its influence, 82; recommends doing away with obscured windows, &c., in public houses, 84, 91; no provision for admission of vagrants into casual wards, 45; police provide food and shelter for large numbers, at public expense, 45-51, 107-111; Corporation have model lodging-houses, each accommodating from 300 to 400, charges varying from 8d. to 4½d. per night, inmates mostly casuals, though there are a number permanent lodgers, 52-60; also large number of private lodging-houses, registered, open to police inspection, 61-66; for deserving men out of work and on tramp without funds the Corporation have no provision except at police office, 112, 115-116; on application, police might direct them to the Night Asylum, 113, where a night's rest could be obtained, or to the Charity Organization Society, where, in return for a day's work at preparing firewood, money for food and shelter would be given, 117-119, 130; considers an institution where a night's shelter and breakfast could be had in exchange for work desirable.

CHRISTIE, Captain.

For nineteen years Governor of Edinburgh Prison, 2543-2544; average daily population 300 to 350, 2545; one-fifth females, 2548; a considerable number under sentence of one day received from outlying burghs—instances case from Selkirk, 2551-2557; sentences on habitual offenders much too short for reformatory purposes, 2561-2562; and present prison discipline unsuitable, 2608-2609; would fix six months after three or four convictions for drunkenness, 2606; and would recommend their being put to agricultural work in country, 2563-2571, 2586-2595; suggests two years as maximum sentence, 2601; discharged prisoners sent to Salvation Army generally do well, 2572-2574; juveniles received into prison, 2575-2577; instances case of boys, aged nine, 2578-2579; health of prisoners always improved during imprisonment, 2581-2583; drink crave only extinguished in a few even after two years' imprisonment, 2584-2585; considers number of prisoners discharged from Edinburgh Prison who do not return to the outlying districts whence they came infinitesimal and mostly tramps, 2611, 2615; increase in indecent assaults largely due to drink, 2617-2618.

CLARKE, Mr WILLIAM.

Has had thirty years' prison experience, 7220; considers short sentences ineffective to prevent crime, 7221; personal interest in individual cases productive of much good, 7222, 7223; sentences on habitual offenders should be for lengthened periods at reformatory work on farms, 7227, 7234; great disparity in sentences for like offences throughout country, 7228-7230.

DEWAR, Mr DAVID.

Chief Constable, Dundee, 12,767; explains Dundee system of liberating on pledge, 12,770; usual amounts increased in 1892, when penalties were increased, 12,771-12,775; statistics of apprehensions for drunkenness show highest number of arrests coincident with heavier penalty, 12,776-12,779; quotes explanation from last Annual Report, 12,780; increased powers not exercised by Magistrates to any great extent, 12,784; penalties slightly increased, 12,786; but with no deterrent effect, 12,787; résumé of sentences on drunkenness for one month, 12,787; effects of Forbes Mackenzie Act on arrests for drunkenness, 12,797-12,799; census of vagrancy showing only three children, 12,801-12,809; vagrancy not increasing, 12,811, 12,812; dealt with under general Police Act, 1862, 12,815, 12,816; considerable increase in cases of prostitution, 12,817; accounted for by increased police vigilance, 12,822; person importuned never appears as a witness, 12,807; number of juveniles sent to Reformatory and Industrial Schools since 1888 showing very few girls, 12,829-12,831; considers Dundee very free of juvenile delinquency, 12,839; previous convictions in all summary cases libelled and, if evidence adduced, proved, 12,845; thinks this practice in harmony with decision of High Court in case Gordon v. Scott in November 1891—nature of, and judgment in case, 12,846-12,853; states the number of arrests followed by conviction, &c., 12,856; and ratio of arrests to population, 12,867-12,871; proportion of petty offenders drunk when arrested, 12,872-12,877; definition of habitual offender, 12,884, 12,991-13,000; pay day drunkards, 12,885, 12,886, 13,014; thinks inquiry on habituals should be either before Sheriff or Magistrate, 12,905-12,909; power of initiating proceedings being with Procurator-Fiscal, Inspector of Poor or relatives of habitual, 13,015; consider habituals when at liberty a source of contamination, 12,920, 12,921; thinks it might act as a restraint if some were allowed time to pay fines imposed, 12,931-12,942; thinks the smaller ratio of police to population in Dundee partly accounts for difference in arrests between it and Glasgow, 12,960-12,968; thinks a system of reform colonies the best way of dealing with habituals, 12,969-12,973; proportion of recommitments in Dundee, 13,005-13,007; thinks petty thefts closely associated with drunkenness, 13,017-13,020; does not approve of public birching, 13,025-13,027; evidence led in cases of importuning, 13,028-13,042.

DEWAR, Mr JOHN ALEX.

Lord Provost of Perth, 6291; vagrancy pretty prevalent, 6295-6301; probable reasons for increase of apprehensions, 6303-6306; would punish severely publicans supplying drink to persons notified as habitual drunkards, 6312-6316; and would restrict dealings of pawnbrokers with such, 6314; opinion of self and magistrates is that habitual drunkards should be detained in reformatory institutions to be maintained by Municipality and Government, 6318-6322.

M'HARDY, R.N., Captain HARDY.

Chief Constable of Ayrshire, explains origin of Ayrshire Mendicity Society, 12,408; particulars of Society's methods, 12,409-12,422, 12,441-12,446; and extent of last year's operations, 12,423-12,436; financial results, 12,437-12,440; instances of tickets being presented by men in employment and in funds, 12,447-12,454; few bona fide working men found taking advantage of system, 12,456-12,461, 12,537-12,539, does not think system encourages vagrancy, 12,462, 12,463; vagrancy statistics unreliable, 12,468-12,476; particulars of operations of similar society in Dorsetshire, 12,480-12,491; attributes steady increase in arrests for vagrancy and other petty offences to the creation of police burghs in the counties, 12,492-12,495; good results following the employing of police as relieving officers in Essex, 12,496-12,499, 12,511, 12,512; feels strongly that it would be a mistake to extend powers of Burgh Police Act anent vagrancy and drunkenness to counties, and thinks present powers under various statutes sufficient, 12,518-12,524; failure of attempt in Essex to suppress vagrancy by imprisonment, 12,525.

MACKAY, Mr WILLIAM.

Considers high ratio of apprehensions in Ayr due to influx of excursionists, militiamen, &c., 11,834-11,837, 11,866-11,867; previous convictions of those apprehended during 1898, showing number of habitual offenders, 11,838-11,843; illustrative cases, 11,879-11,884; considers imprisonment has little effect on habitual offenders who should be sent to a retreat, 11,843, 11,862; Local Authorities and Prison Commissioners contributing to upkeep, 11,886; practice of liberating prisoners with or without pledges, 11,846-11,849; increased penalties under Burgh Police Act rarely inflicted,

11,850, 11,851; Ayrshire pass system for relief of vagrants, &c., responsible for considerable influx of vagrants, 11,853-11,857, 11,863; which is increasing, 11,859-11,862; prostitution amongst young women too common in Ayr, 11,873, 11,874; and very difficult to deal with, 11,870; laxity of police in regard to prostitution, 11,871, 11,872.

M'KENZIE, Mr ARCHIBALD.

Ex-Bailie, Aberdeen, 7711; thinks short sentences on habitual offenders are not deterrent, 7715, 7755; and present powers of dealing with petty offences insufficient, 7717; considers public opinion favourable to increased powers of dealing with habituals, 7737, 7738; thinks they should be sent to institutions under Government control and made to work, 7717, 7747; cost to be met by Imperial funds and the contributions of friends of inmates where able, 7717, 7730; employments, 7719-7729; would give powers to magistrates or justices to commit habituals to retreats on representation of friends or neighbours, 7733-7736; would utilise existing institution so far as possible, 7761.

M'KENZIE, Rev. Mr.

M'LAGAN, Mr.

One of deputation from Perthshire Committee on Vagrancy. See under Col. WILLIAMSON.

MACLAGAN, Sir DOUGLAS.

Professor of Medical Jurisprudence in Edinburgh University, 5659-5661; considers present system of short sentences for habitual offenders injurious, 5662; would abolish fines, 5663; and after seven convictions within one or two years would detain as habituals in reformatory institutions for two or three years at outdoor labour, 5664-5668, 5671-5674, 5693-5695, 5718; thinks proceedings before Sheriff and medical certificates before committal to institutions unnecessary, 5673, 5692; views on connection of drunkenness and disease and treatment necessary, 5675-5677, 5696-5704; thinks medical and scientific opinion would support compulsory legislation, 5705; considers it undesirable to identify inebriety and lunacy, 5717; habitual prostitutes to be kept in separate establishment, 5708; and thinks inebriety in prostitutes an effect rather than a cause, 5720; would not interfere with vagrants unless dishonest, 5711-5711, 5723.

M'LAREN, Mr DAVID.

Formerly connected with Edinburgh Town Council, and County Prison Board, 15,151; quotes report of Inspector of Prisons in 1847, and report of County Prison Board Committee in 1862, anent system of frequent recommitment of prisoners, 15,153; also quotes motion by the Right Hon. Lord Kinnaird in 1864, recommending committal of habitual petty offenders to poorhouses or asylums for treatment, 15,156; comparative statement of ratio of committals for years 1860-1863 in Edinburgh, Glasgow and Perth, 15,158; figures as to number of habitual offenders in Edinburgh, 16,150; quotes opinions anent deterrent effects of cropping hair of prisoners, 15,172, 15,773; thinks habituals should be detained for lengthened periods in adult reformatories, 15,177, 15,178; and favours the establishment of principle of 'habit and repute' for petty offences, 15,183.

M'MULLEN, Rev. Father JOHN.

Estimates Catholic population of Glasgow, 10,325b.; and considers they contrast favourably as regards sobriety with Irish Catholic population of Liverpool, Manchester and London, 10,325c.-10,332; thinks the question of the housing of poor, and the want of rational amusements have to do with the prevalence of intemperance, 10,342; as also the large number of public-houses and the laxity in carrying out licensing laws, 10,347, 10,348; suggests that list of persons declared to be habitual drunkards should be supplied to publicans, and they prohibited from supplying such with drink, 10,352-10,358; after which, if not effective would give relatives power to initiate proceedings before Sheriff for committal to a retreat, 10,359; no reformatory school for Roman Catholic girls in Scotland, 10,396-10,398, 10,400.

M'NAUGHTON, M.D., JOHN.

Medical Officer of Perth Prison, and Medical Superintendent of Criminal Lunatic Asylum, 6980; considers system of short sentences on habitual offenders inadequate and demoralising, 6932-6937; would detain such for lengthened period under dietetic and medical treatment, 6940-6951, 6990; suggests twelve months as minimum period of detention, 7020; leaving maximum indefinite, 7021-7022; all undergoing period of probation prior to conditional release, 7033-7039; from 15 to 20 per cent. of insane inmates are alcoholic cases, 6953-6954; cases of cures, 6955-6962; system of liberating insane prisoners on licence, 6963-6967; thinks weak-minded petty offenders should not be sent to prison but to separate institution, 6984-6988; considers separate confinement for long periods detrimental, 6992-6994, 7010-7015, 7061-7062, 7071-7077; and that evils of association could be obviated by proper classification, 6995-7005, 7016-7017; experience of beneficial results from prolonged detention of certain cases, 7006, 7018-7019; drunkenness as a disease, 7023-7025; favours agricultural labour and laundry work for habitual drunkards, 7026-7030, 7040-7053, 7057-7060, 7063-7071; difficulties of applying system of guardians to habitual offenders and drunkards, 7031; 200 to 300 the maximum number in an institution, 7038; essence of the treatment that superintendent should know each case individually, 7038.

M'NEILL, Mr MALCOLM.

Secretary to Local Government Board speaks to Shelter Houses in Jedburgh, Selkirk, and Stirling, 5842-5844; quotes circular by the Board containing rules to obviate certain abuses of the system, 5845-5850; want of effective powers of interference, 5852; shelter accommodation in Forfarshire, &c., 5858; shelters not suggested as substitutes for casual wards but for sick and infirm poor, 5861, 5862; powers of Parochial Boards to detain pauper children very limited, 5867-5871; poorhouses getting emptier through extension of boarding-out system, 5873; improved classification of paupers desirable, 5874; and further power for detention of dissolute and restless paupers, 5875.

MACPHERSON, Mr JOHN.

Chief Constable of Perthshire, 6323; number of habituais in Perthshire small, 6326; system of short sentences for such is useless, 6327, 6497, 6503; recommends cumulative sentences, 6328, 6471; number of gipsy families and their dependants in the county, 6335; vagrant children get no education, 6337, 6396-6398; should be compulsorily educated, and sent to Industrial School, 6353, 6468, 6469, 6489; gipsies generally honest and orderly, 6333-6347, 6431-6446; advocates the prohibition of camping-out and providing of parochial shelters, 6349-6352; majority of tramps are not bond fide workmen in search of work, 6365; number of apprehensions for vagrancy, 6372, 6467; advocates provision being made for relief of bond fide workmen and aged and infirm vagrants and vagrant children, 6379-6391; strongly recommends extension to counties of power under Police Burgh Act respecting drunkenness and vagrancy, 6403, 6404; cites county Bye-laws for Prevention of Vagrancy, 6405-6414; persons liberated on pledges always cited to appear at court, 6418-6423; good results from placing certain persons charged with drunkenness under caution, 6472-6483; no steps taken to deal with vagrant children, either by School Board or police, 6484-6492.

MILLER, Dr J. W.

Medical Officer Dundee Prison, &c. &c., 13,375; gives particulars of cases of weak-minded persons sent to prison, 13,376-13,403, 13,408-13,411, 13,419-13,428; and suggests that for harmless cases there should be power to detain in poorhouse on long or indefinite sentences, 13,431-13,433; dangerous lunatics being kept in Perth Lunatic Department, and those insane but not dangerous in ordinary asylums, 13,407, 13,408, 13,412-13,418, 13,431-13,433, 13,443-13,452; thinks the compulsory confinement of the small number of local habituals would be for public advantage, 13,437-13,443; would fix minimum period of detention at one year, leaving maximum indeterminate, 13,453-13,455; considers it probable that a large proportion might be cured, 13,456, 13,457; strongly recommends outdoor labour for both men and women, 13,458-13,460; considers long periods of separate confinement detrimental, 13,439-13,444; submits memorandum from Dundee branch of British Medical Association, 13,460.

MILNE, Mr GEORGE.

Secretary, Aberdeen Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, 7988; proportion of habitual offenders in Aberdeen very large, 7991; memorialised Secretary for Scotland suggesting establishment of adult reformatory institutions for prolonged detention of inebriates, with committal on lapsing, 7991; suggests also the hiring-out of inmates on probation, 7999; present system has no deterrent effect on habituals, 7992; thinks those mentally deficient should be confined in poorhouses, 7997; would whip juvenile offenders in preference to imprisonment, 7995, 7996; difficulties in helping habituals after discharge, 8001, 8009.

MITCHELL, Mr WM.

One of deputation from Perthshire Committee on Vagrancy. See under Col. WILLIAMSON.

MITCHELL, Mr WILLIAM, Glasgow.

Connected with Glasgow School Board for twenty-one years, and with Juvenile Delinquency Board for twelve years, Vice-Chairman of both, 147-149; default officers report from 50 to 75 per cent. of default cases annually under notice, to be attributable to drunkenness of parents, but mainly in aggravated cases are parents frequenters of Police Court, 152-157, 227, 242; drunken mothers specially difficult to deal with, 228, 230; defaulting parents dealt with by Board in first instance, 152, and only after manifold dealings, by the Sheriff, 231-234, 239; children of habitual drunkards generally sent to Day Industrial Schools, 158-164, 212; procedure prior to admission, 165-168; parents contribute to maintenance, 168; minimum and maximum length of committal, 171; Magistrates frequently send juveniles charged with petty offences to Day Industrial Schools instead of convicting them, 177-178; many thus dealt with would otherwise become vagrants and beggars, 176; no further powers needed to deal with children of defaulting parents in Glasgow, 187; School Attendance Department overtaking all but a very small proportion, who escape through continual moving about, 214-219, 235-237; chiefly conversant with tinkers in Perthshire, 179-181; adults all drunkards, 183, 200; constantly quarrelling and responsible for large percentage of petty crimes, 208; their dwellings but a few sacks or old rags over upright poles, 189-190, 194, 199; the children destitute and degraded, absolutely neglected, no education, 182-184; mortality excessive through exposure, &c., 205-207; no moral training or teaching, 211; recommends Home for Inebriate parents with a probation of from six to twelve months, but if not reformed thinks easier means of separation from family desirable, 229; (1) regarding tinkers, suggests that Local Authority should have power to prevent landlords or tenants giving such people leave to set up their tents on their lands, 188; (2) the registration of all such movable dwellings under Local Authority for inspection, and the provision of refuges, 192, 195; with imprisonment if necessary, 225-226; believes moral suasion more effective than punitive measures, 257; would exempt caravans from such regulations, 196, 210-211.

MORRIN, Bailie DAVID.

Magistrate of Glasgow for six years, 1630-1632; considers ninety per cent. of petty offences attributable to drunkenness, 1633, 1635, 1711-1716, 1728-1731; diversity of practice amongst Magistrates in sentencing for drunkenness, &c., 1636-1641; personal method with petty offenders, 1642, 1757-1764; difficulty of enforcing a system of cumulative sentences, 1649-1652; short sentences not reformatory, 1653, 1723-1725, 1753; difficulty of defining an Habitual Drunkard so as to include only those with whom desirable to deal, 1654-1660, 1717-1719; considers female habituals increasing, 1720; habituals should be remitted to Sheriff for enquiry, 1669-1670; who should have power to commit to retreats those found to be habituals for periods from three to six months, and any not so dealt with to imprisonment for not exceeding sixty days, 1667-1668, 1671, 1708-1704, 1721-1722; retreats to be maintained by proceeds of labour and funds partly local and partly Imperial, 1672-1683, 1744-1750; Trades Unions and Prison Labour, 177; juvenile offenders, 1754-1756, 1772-1784; prefers whipping to imprisonment for such, 1779-1781; persons weak-minded and unfit for prison discipline should be sent to homes, 1735-1743; difficulty of convicting publicans for supplying drink to persons already under its influence, 1766; would restrict dealings of publicans and pawnbrokers with certified habituals, 1769-1770; number of prisoners in prison for importuning on certain dates, 1785-1790; instances case of prostitute restored to friends and doing well, 1791-1794; powers of Magistrates to liberate, 1796-1798; "finish" and ether drinking, 1662-1666, 1726-1727.

MOTION, Mr JAMES R.

Acting-Inspector of Poor for Barony Parish of Glasgow for nine years and connected with Barony Board for twenty-eight years, 246-249; explains system of boarding out lunatics, 253-257, and of medical relief, 261-262; poorhouse and hospital accommodation, 264-265; inmates classified, 265; those classed as depraved, and consist chiefly of males with venereal disease, and females with illegitimate children, 266-274; details cases of males and females, 276-301; nothing in Scotland corresponding to English casual wards, 302-305; decent working-men on tramp in search of work not accommodated under Scotch Poor Law, 306; considers those sheltered at police office, constitutional loafers, 307-309; present power of detention of paupers in poorhouse unsatisfactory, 331-339; great deal of habitual drunkenness met with in administration of Poor Law, 319; considers it rather leniently dealt with by Magistrates, 322; thinks six convictions for drunkenness within any period should constitute an Habitual Drunkard, 321-325; would discriminate between inebriates of poorhouse class and working-men, 389-390; habituals could be economically treated in partly vacant poorhouses throughout the country, 320, 347-347 362-366; proceeds of labour would greatly diminish cost, 367-369; would fix maximum period of detention at two years, and minimum at six months, 370-373; which might be reduced by Magistrates on certificate by medical man, 378; does not connect inebriates with habitual petty thefts, 380-381; was connected with deputation to Germany to inspect Labour Colonies, 326; extract from German Penal Codes giving offences for which persons might be sent to Compulsory Labour Colonies, 327-328; children of paupers kept in special department and go to public schools, 356; children of depraved parents may be removed from parents' custody under Act of 1892, and boarded out, 331-334; since 1884, 488 have been so removed with good results, 336-338; and parents' claim for restoration of children can be opposed under The Custody of Children Act, 1891, 386-388; poorhouse populations lowest about August and September, and highest about January and February, 348-349, caused by restless paupers, who go on tramp during spring and summer and return for winter months, 348-354; would suggest Government contribution towards expense of treatment of habituals, 391-392.

Was associated with Dr A. J. Currie in 'metabolic' treatment of inebriety, 11,086; connection severed through action of General Medical Council, 11,087, 11,088; opinion as to 'cure,'—its composition, administration and results, 11,089-11,152; considers it valuable as a remedy for results of intemperance, 11,089, 11,096, 11,127, 11,134; thinks it necessary that patient be aware of what he was being treated to, 11,132-11,147.

NAISMITH, M.D., F.R.C.S., W. J.

Surgeon to Ayr Prison, 12,344; has found great difficulty in private practice in dealing with cases of habitual drunkenness through want of compulsory powers, 12,347, 12,348; considers voluntary nature of present facilities unsatisfactory, 12,349-12,351; and thinks relatives of an habitual drunkard have power by petitioning Sheriff to have him confined, 12,390, 12,391; considers petty offenders are increasing due to inefficiency of system of short sentences, 12,354-12,359, 12,376; thinks sentences should be cumulative, and favours compulsory detention in adult reformatory at suitable work, 12,360-12,363, 12,379; would not differentiate workman who was habitually drunk on pay days and was convicted, 12,364, 12,365; does not hold confident views as to curing habitual drunkards, 12,366-12,369; and considers no disease known where heredity has more frightful influence, 12,371-12,373; would fix one or two months as minimum period of detention, 12,379; considers long terms of separate confinement deleterious to both mind and body, 12,380-12,383; would send epileptic and weak-minded offenders to poorhouse instead of prison, 12,384-12,387, 12,392-12,407.

NAPIER, Mr Wm.

Governor Greenock Prison, 12,086; does not think imprisonment has any good effect on habitual offenders, 12,089A., 12,145; illustrative cases of weak-minded prisoners who ought to be sent to poorhouse, 12,090-12,125; would not send persons to prison for simple drunkenness, 12,130, 12,146; unless habitual, when they should be committed for from 1 month to 6 weeks, 12,130, 12,147; previous convictions should be libelled, 12,131-12,136; advocates adult reformatory for aged offenders, 12,143-12,149; prison labour and outside competition, 12,153-12,163; treatment of vagrancy in Fifeshire, formerly resulting in damages being given against chief constable, 12,169-12,180; sharp dealing with sheebeners in Greenock, 12,181-12,186; would assist honest tramps and provide shelters under police control, 12,187, 12,188, 12,201, 12,202; administration of Greenock tramp shelter, 12,190-12,197, 12,204; considers drink a factor in 90 per cent. of all crime, 12,212-12,214; begging in Rothesay, 12,215-12,222.

NEILSON, Mr GEORGE.

Procurator-Fiscal at Glasgow Police Courts, 10,549; thinks ratio of police to population partly accounts for large proportion of arrests for petty offences in Glasgow, 10,554, 10,555; as also the periodical influx of strangers from surrounding places, 10,556, 10,557; but does not think the offences set up under elaborate special Police Acts applicable to Glasgow in any way accounts for the large number of arrests, 10,560; ratio between fines and terms of imprisonment as limited by Summary Jurisdiction Act, 10,565-10,570; practice followed in Glasgow Police Courts in applying previous convictions, 10,571-10,596, 10,626-10,636, 10,754-10,769; personally is not satisfied that imprisonment is of any use for petty offenders, 10,606, 10,649; thinks Glasgow freer from open prostitution than Edinburgh, 10,605-10,611; Glasgow police and sheebening, 10,614-10,625, 10,713-10,715, 10,728; usual treatment of juvenile offenders—magistrates generally opposed to whipping, 10,638-10,649; personally favours enforcement of parental chastisement in preference to public whipping or imprisonment, 10,650; system of liberating on pledge in Glasgow, 10,651-10,675, 10,736-10,745; thinks proceeds of pledges, fines, &c., might fitly be applied in part to institution for treatment of offenders in Glasgow, 10,670-10,678; thinks accommodation, &c., for prisoners in police cells prior to trial might be improved, 10,680-10,690; prosecutions for using abusive language, 10,694-10,702; would favour the remitting of habitual offenders to Sheriff to be dealt with for specific offence, and afterwards committed as an habitual to adult reformatory, 10,705-10,712, 10,730; general procedure in cases of prostitution, 10,719-10,727; usually admonished for first offence, 10,718.

NICOLSON, Dr DAVID.

Physician-Superintendent Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Broadmoor, and Member of English Departmental Committee on Inebriates, 13,856; states that weak-minded convicts formerly kept in Woking Prison employed at light labour, 13,860-13,864; insane short sentenced prisoners go to County Asylums, 13,866; does not think intemperance of itself largely productive of insanity, 13,873, 13,874; no special means for mitigation of sentences of weak-minded prisoners, 13,890-13,892; percentage of cases committed during Her Majesty's pleasure where insanity is due to intemperance, 13,907-13,911; favourable results of treatment at Broadmoor, 13,893-13,896, 13,900-13,902; thinks habitual drunkenness ought to be specially treated apart from question of lunacy, 13,912; and intemperance dealt with much more stringently, 13,913; definition of habitual, 13,922, 13,923; advocates the establishment of retreats and reformatory institutions managed and controlled by State and aided from local sources, 13,875-13,877, 13,915-13,917; thinks labour of inmates would go far to meet expenditure, 13,877-13,879; thinks minimum period of detention should not be less than 12 or 18 months, 13,897; and that power of committal should be in hands of public State official after inquiry, preferably private, 13,918-13,920; annual cost of each criminal lunatic at Broadmoor, 13,881; and average personal earnings of whole, 13,882-13,885.

NICOLSON, Mr JAMES BADENOCH.

Counsel to Scotch Education Department, 13,278; quotes sections of Education Scotland Act regulating the enforcement of attendance of children at school, 13,281, 13,303; but considers the powers inapplicable to gipsy children on account of constant change of abode, &c., 13,283-13,286, 13,315; further difficulties of bringing vagrant children under provisions of Education or Industrial Schools Acts, 13,304-13,306, 13,341-13,352, 13,355-13,362; power of schoolmasters to expel dirty children, 13,289-13,291; expense of sending vagrant children to Industrial Schools prohibitive, 13,292; children of able-bodied gipsies not entitled to relief as paupers, but if detained from parents by Government authority Treasury would be responsible for maintenance, 13,296-13,298; no modern precedent for such detention, 13,301; and does not think Parliament would sanction it, 13,307-13,314, 13,373; number of tinkers in Kincardineshire, 13,318-13,327; no county bye-laws anent vagrancy, 13,329-13,331; thinks it would be advantageous to extend powers anent vagrancy and drunkenness in Burgh Police Act to counties, 13,334-13,340, 13,363-13,368; considers that School Boards have power under Education Scotland Act, 1872, to erect and maintain Industrial Schools, 13,348-13,350, 13,353, 13,354.

NIGHT ASYLUMS AND HOUSES OF REFUGE.

PAROLE

Of habituals—conditional on good behaviour, 3928.

PATERSON, Miss.

Matron of Edinburgh Magdalene Asylum. For evidence, see under Mr ANDREW SCOTT.

PATERSON, Miss MARY.

Inspector under Factory Acts for Scotland, knows no provision of Factory Acts relieving from official inspection charitable institutions, where sewing, &c., is done, although it is generally presumed to be exempt, 12,645, 12,646 ; personally thinks all laundries and sewing rooms in charitable and other institutions should be inspected, 12,649, 12,668-12,668 ; and quotes sections of Act which in her opinion bears out that suggestion, 12,666-12,669 ; hours of labour in some institutions too long, 12,660.

PAUPERISM.

Fifty per cent. due to intemperance, 9925.

PAUPERS.

Half of paupers in Glasgow City Poorhouse deserving, 648.

Migratory paupers to be detained in adult reformatories, and thinks Parochial Boards would contribute, 3862, 3886.

PEDDIE, Dr ALEXR.

Gave evidence before Dalrymple Committee, and has written extensively on Habitual Drunkenness and cognate subjects, 2278-79, 2301 ; considers present legislation inadequate through want of compulsory powers, 2280-81 ; Medical Faculty unanimous as to necessity for further legislation, 2291, 2302, 2306 ; present voluntary homes inadequate, though with their restricted powers their success is remarkable, 2303 ; habitual drunkenness closely akin to insanity, but to be kept from under Lunacy Laws, 2282-2283 ; Habitual Drunkards should be committed to home on certification by medical authorities and friends, dispensing with personal appearance at judicial enquiry unless specially desired, 2286-2288, 2311-2313 ; the homes to be graded for the various classes, 2289, 2292, 2307 ; and maintained partly by contributions and proceeds of labour, and partly by Imperial and local taxation, 2290, 2292, 2293-94, 2298-2300 ; scheme at first should be experimental and enlarged as found to work, 2296 ; probable cost of buildings, 2297 ; thinks 80 per cent. might be cured, 2304.

PRIMROSE, Bailie JOHN URE.

Senior Magistrate of Glasgow, 917; thinks there should be gradation of punishments for drunkenness, &c., 920-922; definition of habitual drunkard, 924; other considerations than actual convictions should weigh, 924-928; would not include workmen who might get drunk on pay-days but who other whiles are sober and industrious, 944-947, 967; would favour their pays being administered by employer for behalf of families, and has done this with good results, 984-985; habituals should be dealt with by Sheriff or Justice, of Peace, 928-931, 973; vagrancy cases pretty frequent, 933-938; considers half of them more fit for Poorhouse than prison, 936; never orders 'drunks' or known them ordered to find sureties, 937; thinks such additional punishment not required and not supported by public opinion, 980-983; strongly convinced of value of special and separate treatment of habitual drunkards, 939; supported by experience of reclamation in local institutions, 939-941, 948-949; not prepared to fix periods of detention necessary to cure, 950; thinks police should have powers of initiation of steps against habituals, 942-943, 965; and in certain cases the familiar neighbours, 965, 966; personally avoids sending children to prison, and thinks fourteen years young enough, 951-952; younger ones should be sent to Reformatory or Industrial Schools, 953-954; accounts for predominance in Glasgow of apprehensions for disorderly conduct, 956-966, 975-977; Glasgow governed by more stringent laws than any other town in Scotland, 177; sentences for petty offences heavier for year or so back than formerly, 978-979; police should keep register of all apprehensions for drunkenness, &c., 986; considers present powers of dealing with publicans supplying drink to intoxicated persons ample if enforced, 987; notification of names of habitual drunkards to publicans and pawnbrokers might do good, 989.

PRYDE, M.A., Rev. ROBERT.

Represents Committee on Life and Work of Glasgow Presbytery, twenty-seven years a minister, 1565-1566, 1581-1582; thinks legislation for all classes of Habitual Drunkards urgent, 1568-1569; would fix minimum period of detention at three months and maximum at two years, to be determined by medical testimony, 1587-1588. Cost of maintenance to be met by local rate and proceeds of industry of inmates, aided by Government, 1570-1572, 1594; family of habitual would also need to be maintained, 1573, 1596-1597; habitual drunkenness most prevalent amongst women in lower grades of society, 1574; children of drunken parents presently largely supplied with clothing through School Board and Charity Organization Society, 1578-1580; considers public opinion would support dealing with habituels if cost not too high, 1583-1584; instances case of cure, 1589-1592.

QUARRIER, Mr WM.

Thirty years' experience in reclamation of children, 10,143; scope of James Morrison St. Home, Glasgow, 10,145-10,153, 10,237-10,244; and Bridge of Weir Homes, 10,155-10,157, 10,210-10,214; numbers annually drafted to Canada, and dispersed over kingdom, 10,157; authentic evidence shows 98 per cent. of those emigrated do well, 10,167, 10,168; usual period of detention in Homes two years, 10,260, 10,261; regards longer detention in institutions apt to do harm, 10,255-10,265; would favour indeterminate sentences for children sent to reformatory or industrial schools, 10,197-10,199, 10,294, 10,295; girls instructed in house and laundry work, and dressmaking, and some trained as assistant teachers, 10,176; boys taught shoemaking, joinering, baking, &c., 10,180; some also employed on poultry farm, which pays splendidly, 10,183-10,193; power of withholding children from dissolute parents, 10,200-

10,206, 10,254; receives about 100 pauper children annually from each of Glasgow Parochial Boards, 10,228; contributions from Parochial Boards entirely voluntary, 10,230; states views on the reclamation of habitual offenders, 10,274-10,288; no classification of children in Homes, 10,296, 10,297; attaches more importance to environment than to heredity, 10,308-10,312; objects to whipping of boys above 14, which is rarely resorted to in Homes, 10,315-10,321; and thinks children should not be sent to prison, 10,316, 10,322.

RITCHIE, Dr PHEL.

Connected with St John's Hill Rescue and Probationary Home, 5228–5229; result not encouraging, 5232–5234; points submitted to conference of Rescue Workers, 5235; reasons for seeking powers of compulsory detention, 5240, 5251, 5259, 5294, 5339; would fix maximum period at two years, 5327–5329, 5340; chiefly employed at laundry work, 5245–5246, 5313; other occupations, 5246, 5334–5337; proportion of inmates who are inebriates, 5252, 5286–5290; analysis of their ages, 5324; about one-third remain for full term of eighteen months, 5249–5250, 5321; and with them results more satisfactory, 5261; the others repeatedly come back, 5260; supervision after discharge unsatisfactory, 5264; no classification of inmates, 5307–5311; Home nearly self-supporting, 5275; some cases sent to Home from Police Courts, 5278–5279, 5315–5316; investigation as to formation of palate of inmates, 5290–5292.

ROBERTSON, Mr ALEXANDER.

Agent for Edinburgh Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, 6014; does not take charge of gratuities earned in prison by ordinary prisoners, 6026–6032; nature of help given, 6033–6046; average amount, 6061–6071; habitual offenders form large percentage of those helped, 6084–6087; results of Society's work, 6088–6092, 6096–6099; the disbursing of prisoners' gratuities would lengthen period of Society's supervision, 6293–6295.

ROBERTSON, M.A., D.Sc., Rev. J. D.

Represents Edinburgh Presbytery of U.P. Church, 6184; results of inquiries by circular within Presbytery bound distinctly favourable to increased powers of dealing with habitual inebriates, 6185–6188; thinks the law as to adulteration of drink should be more stringently enforced, and the sale of liquor to children prohibited, 6189; that publicans who supply drink to persons known to have been convicted frequently of drunkenness should forfeit licence, and that a reduction in the number of licences should be effected, 6190; institutions for reclamation of inebriates, to be aided by Government grant and voluntary contributions, 6191; treatment of inmates to be elaborately graded, 6192; thinks public opinion favourable to such proposals, 6194.

ROGERS, Mr HENRY.

Assistant Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 14,697; gives list of Scotch Schools and their population, 14,698–14,703; with subsequent history of Reformatory school cases showing large percentage of Scotch Protestant Girls whose whereabouts are given as unknown, 14,704, 14,705; considers this reflects seriously on management of Glasgow and Dalry Schools especially, 14,706–14,709; system of checking returns of subsequent history of scholars, 14,710–14,718; percentage of reclamations, 14,710, 14,719–14,728; average annual cost of maintenance, 14,741–14,745; total Government contributions in England and Scotland, with amounts recovered from parents, 14,749–14,760; liability of Parochial Boards for children sent to Industrial Schools by them, and of School Boards for children sent to Day Industrial Schools, 14,761–14,767, 14,869–14,871; subsequent history of children discharged from Industrial Schools, 14,772–14,781; cost of maintenance, 14,782–14,798; inspection of schools very comprehensive, 14,794–14,797; educational state—English Code used, 14,798–14,813, 14,873; cases of children refused by schools on account of physical infirmity, considers separate institutions required for such, 14,814–14,820, 14,845–14,856; corporal punishment for breach of rules, 14,832; would like to see more Day Industrial

Schools in Scotland, 14,876; proportion of boys in Reformatories in Scotland greater than in England, 14,877, 14,878; thinks liberation of boys on licence not used sufficiently in Scotland, 14,882–14,884; considers it disastrous to keep boys longer in Reformatory Schools than needful, 14,883, 14,886–14,889; difficulty of disposing of children sentenced to Reformatory Schools prior to removal, 14,890–14,895; some authorities complain that the abolition of the previous term of imprisonment on such has had bad effects, 14,896.

RORIE, Dr JAMES.

Physician-Superintendent of Dundee Royal Lunatic Asylum, 13,577; considers 16 to 18 per cent. of cases of insanity due to drink, 13,580, 13,615, 13,616; does not consider asylum or lunatic ward of poorhouse proper places for treatment of inebriates, 13,581, 13,619, 13,625; objections, 13,626; but considers it desirable that there should be power to detain in the poorhouse paupers who move between it and the prison, 13,628–13,630; thinks there ought to be public institutions for detention of inebriates on similar lines to Lunacy Acts as well as private houses specially licensed, 13,636, 13,623, 13,627; minimum period of detention not to be less than twelve months, 13,585; would have special institution for treatment of police habituals and vicious class of insane, 13,592, 13,593; institutions to be maintained by public rates, 13,587; thinks Parochial Authorities too prone to discharge insane persons from lunatic wards of poorhouses, 13,595–13,600; is not sanguine of the results of prolonged detention of dipsomaniacs in institutions, 13,603, 13,618; system of liberation of pauper insane on probation, 13,606–13,611; personally has found administration of bitter tonics very beneficial in some cases of dipsomania, 13,612, 13,613, 13,621, 13,622; various forms of drug drinking, 13,631–13,633; procedure on committal of lunatic to asylum at instance of Fiscal, 13,634–13,637; thinks inquiry before Sheriff prior to committal of habitual should be private, but would grant public inquiry inquiry if desired, 13,638, 13,629.

ROSE, Mr W. KINNAIRD.

Member of Scottish and Queensland Bars, 6244; appointed Commissioner in Australia to inquire into treatment of prisoners and convicts, 6245; sentences for petty offences much alike in both countries, 6248; special laws in Queensland dealing with habitual drunkards, 6250–6253n.; and licensing system, 6253i.–6253k.; restrictions on pawn-brokers in dealing with habituals, 6277; number of habitual offenders, 6253k., 6255, 6258; bill introduced into Parliament to establish inebriate asylums, 6256, 6274–6274A.; system of gratuities to prisoners recommended as means of ensuring supervision after discharge, 6259–6261; work of Prison Gate Brigade of Salvation Army in Queensland, 6262–6264, 6275; proportion of police to population in Colony, 6272, 6273; treatment of juvenile offenders in Queensland, 6281–6284; strongly approves of inebriate retreats, 6285; where inmates could be put to work, 6289, 6290.

ROSS, M.A., Rev. D. M.

Represents Dundee Presbytery of Free Church, 13,461; returns sent in by whole of ministers show 87 habitual drunkards, mostly non-criminal, known to them in their pastoral work, 13,462; thinks 90 per cent. of them too poor to pay for treatment in Inebriate Retreats, 13,471; which considers should be maintained by the State, 13,472; relatives paying where able, 13,485; all members of Presbytery approve of compulsory detention of habitual drunkards, 13,475; and think any interested party or relative should have power to initiate proceedings for committal, 13,486, 13,487; thinks power of compulsory detention would deter many from becoming habituals, 13,489; and that law regarding the supplying of liquor to persons already intoxicated should be more strictly enforced, 13,490–13,495; considers public opinion in Dundee favours more stringent measures in dealing with habitual offenders, 13,497–13,499; personally thinks that women preponderate as habitual drunkards, 13,500–13,503; and knows that a large number of workmen get drunk on pay-days who do not become habituals, 13,504–13,511.

RUSSELL, Sir JAMES A.

Difference in arrests for petty offences between Glasgow and Edinburgh accounted for, 1908–1914, 2024; system of liberation on pledge, 2018–19; great disparity in sentences imposed for particular offences by Sheriffs and Magistrates, 1917, 1926; resulting in many pleading not guilty where Magistrate is known to be severe, and asking adjournment, 1917; previous convictions for drunkenness not considered, 1918–1921; uselessness of penalties inflicted on prostitutes, 1926-1931; great care exercised in apprehending prostitutes, 1932-1935, 1995-1998, 2030-2031, 2046-2051; persons importuned seldom appear, 2029-2031; not very many beggars in Edinburgh, 1948; tramp, received into Night Asylum and House of Refugees 1936-1944; very few sheltered at police office, 1938; thinks parochial authorities should deal with beggars, 1949; details cases of habitual offenders, 1945-1946; considers habitual drunkards as semi-lunatics, and would detain such compulsorily at public cost, generally for not less than two years, but for life if needed, 1950-1957, 1976-1978, 1984-1992, 2010-2014, 2041-2045, 2052-2056; difficulty of dealing with workmen who get drunk at paytime but otherwise sober, 1979; would favour wages being handed over to wives, if trustworthy, 1980-1981; would raise age for committal to reformatory schools as a check on juvenile delinquency, 1958-1959, 1966-1975; whipping as a punishment for juveniles unpopular and imprisonment undesirable, 1960-1964, 1975, 1993-1994, 2038-2040; drunkards who do not come before Police Court often dealt with through Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children and Association for Improving Condition of the Poor, 2000-2009, 2020-2023; difficulty of restricting pawnbrokers in their dealing with habituals, and of convicting publicans of supplying drink to persons under its influence, 2057-58.

RUTHERFURD, Sheriff.

Explains arrangement under which Sheriff-Substitutes and Magistrates preside alternately in Edinburgh Police Court, 2702-2709; and justifies system of remanding prisoners pleading not guilty, 2716, 2778; and of sentencing those pleading guilty without evidence of accusers, 2720-2721A; charging of previous convictions in police cases, 2710-2714, 2790-2796; personal attitude towards petty offences, especially importuning for prostitution, 2722-2728, 2781-2785; fears as to police action against prostitutes, 2785-2788, 2783; better class prostitutes rarely prosecuted, 2785, 2740, 2833A; considers sentences of fourteen or thirty days for importuning oppressive, not reformatory, and liable to reduction by High Court, 2729-2734, 2765-2766, 2808; committal of these women to homes desirable, 2804-2805; maximum penalties for drunkenness and disorderly conduct in local and general Police Acts, 2744-2752; punishment of juvenile offenders, 2753-2754, 2797-2799, 2806-2807, 2841-2843; imprisonment for such undesirable, 2755-2756, 2797, 2812-2814; whipping more satisfactory, 2757-2762, 2798-2799; parents might be put under security for child's conduct, 2800-2801; and age for whipping should be raised to sixteen years, 2828; police sentence for drunkenness not reformatory, 2768, 2846; would favour establishing retreats for habitual drunkards, 2773, 2827; where compulsory detention for long periods might be tried, 2776; enquiry before Sheriff should precede all committals to retreats, as under Lunacy Laws, 2824, 2835-2840, 2850-2851; number of habituals in Edinburgh, 2849; complaints of forcible detention of inmates of Queensberry Lodge, 2852-2857.

RUTLEDGE, Mr JOHN.

WYNESS, Mr THOMAS.

Chief Constable of Aberdeen, 7439; accounts for low ratio and increased number of apprehensions, 7443, 7444, 7527, 7619; persons released on pledge and who do not appear rarely proceeded against, 7449, 7553-7557; imprisonment not deterrent, 7476; and does not think increased penalties would do much good, 7457; cases of habitual offenders, 7458-7465; definition of habitual offender, 7468, 7633; would have them sent to adult reformatories in country, where they could maintain themselves by work, cost of institutions to be borne by imperial funds, 7468-7470, 7534, 7609-7611, 7639; number of habituels, 7444, 7466, 7583-7588, 7586, 7587; increased severity has not mitigated the evil, 7589, 7590; usual sentence for prostitution, 7478-7491; prostitutes warned before apprehension, 7627-7631; number of men prosecuted for importuning, 7628, 7643-7646; penalties for vagrancy, 7492-7495; magistrates over indulgent, 7496, 7497; shelter accommodation for tramps, &c., insufficient, 7500-7511, 7562-7567; homes for fallen women, 7512; many cases have done well, 7568, 7569, 7594A.-7596; convictions against publicans for supplying drink to intoxicated persons, 7518-7526; number of persons drunk when apprehended, 7544; mostly women, 7572; petty thefts and drunkenness, 7546, 7547; majority of first offenders for drunkenness don't come back, 7604-7606; First Offenders Act not applied to petty offenders, 7602; would give initiative against habituels to friends if necessary, 7634; total amount of pledges recovered, 7647.

YELLOWLEES, Dr DAVID.

Is of opinion that the law as it at present stands in regard to Habitual Drunkards is useless and inoperative-1344-1345, 1515; no licensed retreats for Habitual Drunkards in Scotland, 1345; several unlicensed, 1346, 1351, 1392-1393; not under inspection, 1358; and otherwise unsatisfactory, 1350; would have all retreats inspected, 1385-1388, 1397, 1521-1525; views on drunkenness as a vice and a disease, 1353-1358, 1360-1362, 1442-1443; its hereditary tendencies, 1359, 1508-1513; delirium tremens and lunacy, 1365-1368; system of voluntary admission to Scottish Asylums, 1363; no compulsory power of detention, 1364; admission of such cases often undesirable, 1364, 1482-1486; powers of detention in asylums of epileptics, 1536-1541; and cases of incipient insanity, 1548-1560; not sanguine of the effects of prolonged confinement as means of curing drunkenness, 1490; most hopeful in cases of voluntary incarceration, 1369-1375, 1409-10, 1478-1481, 1490-1493; difficulty of fixing periods of detention, 1459-1460; would send every habitual to a retreat, 1461; guardianship of friends unsatisfactory, 1462; considers generally that minimum period should not be less than six months, and in some cases twelve months, 1422-1423, 1452, 1455; with liberation after six months, conditional on subsequent good behaviour, 1424, 1453, 1455-1516-1518; and confinement for life if necessary, 1456-1458; seclusion should be supplemented by congenial and educative occupations and suitable moral environment, 1467-1476, 1519-1520, 1522-1524; American cures useless, 1494, 1534-1535; definition and classification of Habitual Drunkards, 1530-1533, 1376-1378, 1527-1530. I. In case of voluntary applicants, would dispense with restrictions as to appearance before Justices, &c., 1379-1385; favours lunacy patients being boarded out singly, 1434-1438, 1542; and thinks system might be advantageously adopted with certain Habitual Drunkards after probationary period in retreat, 1463-1466, 1542-1546. II. Friends of Habitual Drunkards should have power of initiating proceedings for compulsory detention, and Sheriff's power of commitment to retreats, 1395-1396, 1446-1449; curator bonis to be appointed as in Lunacy, 1398-1399, 1439. III. Police habituels to be dealt with by Sheriff, 1403, 1409-1410, 1413; and sent to retreats rather than asylums, 1404-1409; burden of maintenance partly local and partly Imperial, 1411, 1420-1421, 1414-1418, 1426-1433, 1477; tendency to tipping among women of better class greater than formerly, 1450-1451, 1487; and demands legislation, 1488-1490; fewer recoveries from habitual inebriety than from lunacy, 1861-1862.

YOUNG, Mr ARCHD. A.

Interim Assessor at Glasgow Central Police Court, 12,435; general duties, 12,544-12,546; application of previous convictions in police court cases, 12,549-12,555; 12,606-12,617; more female habitual offenders than males, 12,556, 12,637-12,641; about one-third of male drunk and incapable brought before courts on Mondays do not belong to Glasgow, 12,557-12,561; which largely accounts for Glasgow's high ratio of arrests, 12,562-12,566; does not think Glasgow police officious or unduly interfering, 12,568-12,571; not many respectable working men come before courts habitually, 12,573-12,578; usual treatment of prostitutes, 12,582-12,590, 12,600-12,605; thinks infirm beggars should be committed to care of parochial authorities with powers of detention, 12,590, 12,591; sentences on habitual offenders more severe of recent years, 12,592, 12,593; no however perceptibly diminishing number of arrests, 12,594, 12,595; no fixed time allowed prisoners to obtain payment of fine before going to prison, 12,618-12,623; time occupied on Mondays in disposing of cases, 12,625-12,636.
